IN the following pages, I have attempted to present, in a connected form, the few memorials that remain, of an able and worthy officer of the revolution. A selection from Baron Steuben's manuscript papers, now in possession of the New York Historical Society, has furnished most of the facts related. These papers consist chiefly of letters written and received by him in the course of the war, and several drafts of petitions presented to Congress, in which is contained the little that is known of his early career. Many interesting anecdotes have been obtained from a sketch by Colonel North, first published in the appendix to Dr. Thacher's "Military Journal." A few particulars have been communicated by Mr. Du Ponceau. Pains have likewise been taken to consult such other sources of information as relate to the transactions in which Baron Steuben was engaged.

BARON STEUBEN

AT the commencement of the American revolution, peace generally prevailed in Europe ; and the consequent want of employment induced many French and German officers to look to this country, as a proper field for the display of military talent. The services of some of them were valuable and important. In a pecuniary point of view, however, the prospect was not a tempting one, for the poverty of Congress was as well known abroad as at home. Most of the adventurers, therefore, who crossed the Atlantic, were led by a desire of fame, or by an enthusiastic wish to engage in a contest for freedom. Such spirits were well adapted to imbibe the republican principles of their American associates, and, on their return home, to carry out these principles to the full extent, by engaging in the domestic troubles, which a long train of events had been preparing in Europe. The names of Lafayette and Kosciuszko, first conspicuously known on this side of the ocean, were destined to become the watchwords of liberty to their own countrymen. It was well for this country, that jealousy of British power so far blinded the ministers of Louis the Sixteenth, that they could not foresee this result. Without their aid, the contest here might have terminated in 1778, in favor of England, or have been protracted at an expense, for which even the blessings of liberty might, for a time, have proved an inadequate compensation.

The services of foreign officers, important in every respect, were peculiarly valuable in organizing and disciplining the army, introducing a system of military tactics, and creating the engineer and artillery corps. The colonists had been well trained, during the French and Indian wars, in a kind of partisan service, in which long experience had demonstrated their superiority over the regularly disciplined troops of England. But they were now to contend in the European mode of warfare, against organized soldiery in the open field, and in the attack and defence of fortified towns. Their inability to sustain a contest of such a character was taught in a woful lesson, by the campaign of 1776 in New York and the Jerseys. Nothing but the indomitable spirit of the people, and the great prudence and sagacity of the Commander-in-chief, enabled the army to retrieve the losses of this disastrous year. But the skill of the General turned these defeats to so good an account, that at last they learned from the enemy the art to conquer. The study of tactics was commenced under the instruction of the European volunteers, whose exertions at length placed the regular line on an equal footing, in respect of discipline and military skill, with the English soldiers. No one rendered more important services in this respect, than the subject of the following memoir.

Of the early history of FREDERIC WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, BARON STEUBEN, nothing is known. He was born in some part of Germany, about the year 1730.* We first hear of him in the service of the king of Prussia, with whom he attained the rank of aid-de-camp, and was particularly connected with the Quartermaster-General's department. This arrangement was in conformity with a part of the Prussian system, by which each department had some person near the monarch, to whom the officers directed their requests, and the king applied for any information relative to the condition of the corps.

* A letter from the father of Baron Steuben to Dr. Franklin, making inquiry about his son, which is now before me, is dated at Custrin, in Prussia, October 8th, 1779, and is signed "W. K. von Steuben, Major and Chevalier of the Order of Merit." In this letter the father says he is eighty-one years old, and his wife seventy-three.

Steuben was not, however, a Prussian by birth; for on one occasion he was heard to remark, that if he had been a native subject, the great Frederic would certainly have despatched him as a prisoner to Spandau, for daring to request a dismissal from his service. As the Baron possessed a small estate in Suabia, it is not unlikely that he was born in that province.

Steuben was fortunate enough to engage the friendship and confidence of Prince Henry, the King's brother, to whose family he was for some time attached. In an unfortunate campaign, the Prince incurred the displeasure of his inexorable brother. He was ordered to retire from the field, and his suite were placed in situations intended to make them feel the misfortune of being friends to a man, who had dared to displease the King. Steuben was sent into Silesia, with orders to recruit, equip, and discipline, within a certain period, a regiment broken down by long and hard service. The pecuniary allowance was wholly insufficient for the end proposed; but, in such a service, no intrinsic difficulties could excuse a failure in executing the King's commands. The Baron repaired to the appointed spot, and, by his unwearied exertions, the regiment was marched complete to head-quarters within the time prescribed. This service was performed at an early period, and probably procured the appointment, which he subsequently held, of aid-de-camp to Frederic himself.

It is not unlikely, that another arbitrary exertion of the royal authority induced him, in 1763, to withdraw from the Prussian service. Perhaps the reduction of the army, consequent on the peace of Hubertsberg, which was ratified this year, may have reconciled Frederic to this proceeding. Steuben did not forfeit the favor of the King, who accepted his resignation with kindness, and gave him, by way of pecuniary reward, a canonry in the cathedral of Havelburg, with a salary of twelve hundred German florins. Frederic relied more on the revenues, than on the spiritual services of the church, and used its funds without scruple to pension off his retired officers. The Baron was certainly well fitted to be a valuable officer in the church militant. He ever retained a strong attachment for his stern old master, and was observed to be much affected, when, in America, he received the news of that monarch's death.

That his military talents were highly esteemed in Prussia is shown by a fact of more recent date. When, in the course of the revolutionary war in this country, Congress applied to the several European courts for a transcript of their military codes, the Prime Minister of Prussia replied, that their military instructions had never been published, nor even transcribed, except for the use of the generals. He added, that he was surprised at the request; for he understood that Baron Steuben was employed in the American service, and that no one was better able to give accurate information respecting the minutest details of the Prussian system.

Upon leaving the army, Steuben repaired to his estate of Weilheim, on the borders of Baden and Wurtemberg. As the income of this property, even when united to the emoluments of his ecclesiastical office, was insufficient to maintain him in a style suitable to his rank, he sought employment in a military capacity from some of the German princes. Liberal offers were received from the king of Sardinia, but, by the advice of his friend, Prince Henry of Prussia, these were declined, and he accepted an appointment from the Prince of Hohenzollern-Hechingen, who, in 1764, made him Grand Marshal of the court, with a salary of twelve hundred florins. He was at the same period appointed Colonel in the circle of Suabia, an office more honorable than lucrative. The troops of the circle were chiefly militia, and the duty consisted in little else than attending a periodical review.

In 1767, the Prince Margrave of Baden made Steuben a knight of the Order of Fidelity, and soon afterwards gave him the chief command of the troops, with the title of General, and yearly emoluments to the amount of two thousand florins. As several of the offices enumerated were held at the same time, the situation of the Baron was now so agreeable, that he refused two liberal proffers from the Prime Minister of Austria, to induce him to enter the service of the Emperor.

Steuben retained through life the pride of an old soldier. He always wore the insignia of his order, a star ornamented with gold and diamonds, suspended at the breast of his coat. His military subordinates were obliged to conform strictly to the rules of etiquette, in rendering the outward testimonials of respect due to his office. A little incident, which occurred near the close of the American war, affords an amusing illustration of this amiable weakness.

One day, while at dinner at head-quarters, the Baron happened to express himself with much feeling and energy on some important subject. Gouverneur Morris, who sat at his right hand, was peculiarly struck with the remark, and, in his frank way, slapped Steuben somewhat roughly on the back, and cried out, with an oath, "Well done, General, well done!" Much irritated at the insult, as he deemed it, the old Baron instantly quitted the table, and retired to his marquee, exclaiming, with great warmth, "Confound the fellow! with his old wooden leg, he will govern the whole country."

The situation of Steuben at the courts of Baden and Hohenzollern, for he seems to have divided his time between the two, was sufficiently agreeable. His yearly income, which amounted in all to about five hundred and eighty guineas, afforded ample provision, in that country, for all the expenses that became his rank; while the various offices which he held, employed his time and attention, without being burdensome. He was able to employ a part of each winter in making excursions to France and the principal courts of Germany, where he had a taste of court pleasures, and an opportunity to enlarge his circle of friends. In this way, he formed an acquaintance with the Count de St. Germain, whom he met in Alsace at the house of the Baron de Waldner. In a trip to Montpellier, he was introduced to Prince de Montbarrey; and in 1775 he formed a friendship with several English noblemen, among whom were Lord Spencer and Lord Warwick.

These gentlemen gave him a pressing invitation to come and spend a summer with them in England. Not disinclined to so agreeable a project, he was yet compelled by circumstances to postpone the affair till the year 1777, when he began to think seriously of putting the plan in execution. He went to Paris in April, with the intention of leaving that place for Calais, on his way to London, about the end of June. Having arrived at Paris, he sent a note to the Count de St. Germain, who was then the French Minister of War, testifying a desire to visit him at Versailles. The same evening, Colonel Pagenstecher, a gentleman attached to the court, waited upon Steuben to inform him, that St. Germain desired him not to come to Versailles, but to be at the Arsenal in Paris in the course of a few days, where the Count wished to converse with him on business of importance. As Steuben had no project to execute, nor any favor to ask of the Count, there was a mystery in this proceeding, which he could not fathom. At the interview, however, which occurred at the appointed time and place, all was explained.

The ministers of France had watched with interest the commencement of trouble in the English colonies, and, eager to weaken the power of the rival country, wished to aid the revolutionists as far as they could, without openly compromising themselves with England; a result which they desired to avoid, till the colonists had given better evidence of being able to maintain themselves in the contest. With the privity of the French ministry, arms and money, to a considerable amount, had been shipped to America, and only a mock opposition was made to the wishes of many French officers, who were desirous of enlisting personally in the struggle. Aware of the weak points of the American army, they were anxious to send over an officer of experience, who might drill the undisciplined troops, and introduce such a system of tactics, as would enable them to contend against a well equipped and organized enemy.

Steuben was peculiarly fitted for this purpose. His military experience was known, and his talents were undoubted. To one, who had served through the seven years' war under the great Frederic, but had now been on a peace establishment for more than fourteen years, the prospect of engaging once more in active service could not be unacceptable. Even if the plan should reach the ears of the British minister resident at Paris, still the Baron was not a Frenchman, and had not been received at court, so that no handle could be made of the affair.

At the arsenal, St. Germain laid the project before Steuben in as flattering colors as possible. The colonists had declared themselves independent, and fought single-handed with Great Britain for more than two years. The French wished to aid them, but the time had not yet come. There was a fair opportunity of acquiring military glory, and he might rely on the gratitude of the young republic for valuable services, rendered at an early and pressing period. The Spanish minister, Count d'Aranda, the Prince de Montbarrey, and finally, Vergennes himself, added the weight of their authority to the proposal of St. Germain

On the other hand, Steuben objected the hazard of the enterprise, his time of life, and his ignorance of the English language. Besides, as his personal fortune, independent of the offices which he must resign, was very small, he could not engage in the service without a prospect of adequate remuneration. As the French ministers had no authority to treat upon this point, they referred him to the American envoys then in Paris.

At the house of M. de Beaumarchais, he was introduced to Dr. Franklin and Silas Deane. At the same place, he became acquainted with Peter S. Du Ponceau, then a young man only seventeen years of age, whose services as an interpreter, for he spoke English fluently, were peculiarly valuable.

The envoys showed a desire to enlist the Baron in the American service; but, when the terms were mentioned, a difficulty immediately arose. Mr. Deane was willing to enter into any proper engagement; but Dr. Franklin demurred, and finally said, that he had no authority from Congress to form any contract whatever with a foreign officer, still less to make the required advance of funds to defray the expenses of the voyage. On the contrary, Congress had refused to ratify the conditions, upon which he had already engaged M. Ducoudray and the officers of his suite to embark for America.

To the Baron this answer was decisive; and he would have resumed his former plans immediately, but for the instances of St. Germain, who was still anxious that the negotiation should not be broken off. By his means the affair was protracted till the middle of July, when Steuben, seeing no prospect of a satisfactory arrangement, and as it was now too late for his proposed excursion to England, determined to return to Germany.

He accordingly took leave of his Parisian friends, and on the 25th of July set out for Rastadt, with the intention of resuming his employment under the Prince of Baden. But, on his arrival, he found letters from Beaumarchais and St. Germain, informing him that a vessel was then ready to sail for America, and pressing him to return and embark immediately. They assured him, that satisfactory arrangements should be made. After consultation with his friend, Prince William of Baden, the Baron decided to accept the invitation.

He resigned his several offices, and, by consent of the king of Prussia, transferred the canonry, which he held, to his nephew. Early in August he returned to Paris, and had an interview with the French ministers at the house of Vergennes. It was there determined, that, without any stipulation with the American ministers, he should merely obtain from them letters of introduction to Washington and the President of Congress. On his arrival in the United States, if he could not do otherwise, he was to offer his services as a volunteer, and after exerting himself to the utmost for the success of the cause, was, on the failure of every other chance, to rely on the French court for remuneration. Beaumarchais agreed to furnish the funds which were immediately required for the undertaking.

The French ship L'Heureux, of twenty-eight guns, commanded by Captain Landais, who had served under Bougainville in his voyage round the world, was appointed for the expedition. Her name was changed to Le Flamand, and she was ostensibly freighted by private individuals for a voyage to Martinique. But her lading really consisted of arms and munitions of war for the American service, and the captain had secret orders to proceed to the United States. The Baron embarked at Marseilles on the 26th of September, under the assumed name of Monsieur de Franck. His suite consisted of M. Du Ponceau, who acted as his private secretary, and three French officers, Romanai, L'Enfant, and Ponthière.

After a rough and dangerous passage, the ship arrived at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, on the 1st of December. On their first communication with the shore, they received the news of the capture of Burgoyne, an event of happy omen to Steuben, as it assured him that he had not embarked in a desperate cause.

He wrote immediately to General Washington, enclosing a copy of Dr. Franklin's letter of introduction, and requesting permission to enter the American service, if no other arrangement could immediately be made, in the capacity of a volunteer. "I could say, moreover," he added, "were it not for the fear of offending your modesty, that your Excellency is the only person under whom, after having served under the King of Prussia, I could wish to pursue an art, to which I have wholly given up myself. I intend to go to Boston in a few days, where I shall present my letters to Mr. Hancock, member of Congress, and there I shall wait for your Excellency's orders, according to which I shall take convenient measures."

On the 9th of January, 1778, Washington replied to this letter, and informed Steuben, that it rested entirely with Congress to make suitable provision for him in the army. He must, therefore, proceed to Yorktown, in Pennsylvania, where that body was then convened, lay his credentials before them, and receive their directions for his future conduct. The Baron accordingly set off for Yorktown, where he arrived in February, and, having delivered his letters, was received by the President of Congress with every mark of distinction. The day after his arrival, a committee of five members was appointed to confer with him. Dr. Witherspoon was the chairman of this committee, and the only one to whom Steuben could explain himself in French.

In answer to the questions of this committee, the Baron stated, that he had entered into no agreement with the Commissioners at Paris ; that he made no demand for rank or pay, but had come to serve as a volunteer in the army, expecting, however, that his expenses would be defrayed in the style that was usual for officers, who had served with distinction in Europe. He was not rich ; and, in order to come to America, had resigned offices in Europe, which gave him an income of six hundred pounds sterling. If his services should not prove acceptable, or if the United States should fail in establishing their independence, he would hold them quit of any obligations to him, either for indemnity or reward. But if the value of his services should be acknowledged by the Commander-in-chief, and the war should have a prosperous issue, he hoped that Congress would restore the money he had advanced, would render him an equivalent for the offices he had resigned, and give him such further compensation as they might deem he had deserved. In the mean time, he expected that the officers of his suite should receive employment suitable to their experience, and to the rank which they had held in Europe. To this end, he requested a major's commission for M. de Romanai ; one of captain in the engineer corps for M. L'Enfant, and the rank of captain of foot for his secretary, M. Du Ponceau.

As the grant of these terms could not interfere with the rival pretensions of other officers, the committee declared, that they were perfectly satisfied, and made their report to Congress accordingly. That body voted their thanks to Steuben for his disinterested offer, and ordered him immediately to join the army, which was then in winter-quarters at Valley Forge.

On his way to the camp, the citizens of Lancaster, many of whom were Germans, or of German descent, gave a public ball in honor of his arrival. His reputation had preceded him, and all ranks were eager to see and greet the distinguished foreigner, who came to devote his military skill to the cause of American freedom.

The condition of the Continental troops, during the gloomy winter at Valley Forge, is too well known to need description. It was wretched in the extreme. Reduced to a mere handful in point of numbers, half clothed, and ill sheltered from the inclemency of the weather, they owed their preservation to the supineness or ignorance of the enemy. The Baron frequently declared, that no European army could be kept together under such dreadful deprivations. Discipline was relaxed, and the performance of military duties frequently postponed, from the necessity of employing the soldiers in excursions to procure daily subsistence, or of keeping them housed, because they were too ill clad to endure the open air. As he passed through the cantonment, says his aide-camp, the Baron was obliged to see through the open windows and half-closed doors of the huts, the wretched figures of the soldiers, with only a blanket thrown over them, and to hear, at every turn, their complaints for want of pay, clothes, and provisions.

The irregularities of conduct, arising from the want of equipments and necessities, were heightened by the officers' ignorance of military system, and by the short periods for which the men were enlisted. Many were unpractised even in the manual exercise, and none understood the evolutions requisite for the proper arrangement of troops in the open field. Being collected from different States, they had never been trained to any uniform system of tactics. Utter carelessness prevailed in the use of arms and equipments, and great waste was made of their slender means from the want of proper rules, by which accountability for losses might be pushed home to individuals.

Richard Peters, who then belonged to the War Department, affirmed, that it was customary in the estimates of that office, to allow five thousand muskets beyond the actual numbers of the muster of the whole army. Yet this allowance was never sufficient to guard against the waste and misapplication that occurred. We have the same authority for the assertion, that in the last inspection return of the army, before he left the War Department, Baron Steuben being then Inspector-General, only three muskets were deficient, and those accounted for.

The want of economy in the management of camp equipage, horses, and cavalry and artillery accoutrements, caused the most serious difficulties. Many of those who went home, at the expiration of their term of enlistment, carried with them their arms and military furniture, while the men who came in were entirely unprovided.

When the spring opened, partial supplies were received, and the new levies arrived in considerable numbers. To bring order out of the general confusion, to reduce the raw recruits to a homogeneous mass with the old troops, to accustom the whole to the utmost precision of movement and management of arms, and to yield punctilious obedience to orders, was the hard task assigned to Baron Steuben. He was obliged to instruct equally the officers and the men; the former to lead, and the latter to follow, in intricate evolutions, with which all were alike unacquainted. His difficulties were increased by his ignorance of the English language. His secretary, Du Ponceau, who might have aided him in this point, was sick and absent from the army.

At the first parade, the troops neither understanding the command, nor being able to follow in movements to which they had not been accustomed, were getting fast into confusion. At that moment, Captain Walker, then of the fourth New York regiment, advanced from the line, and offered his assistance to translate the orders and give them out to the troops. "If I had seen an angel from heaven," said the Baron, many years after, "I should not have been more rejoiced. Perhaps there was not another officer in the army, (unless Hamilton be excepted,) who could speak French and English, so as to be well understood in both." Walker became his aid-de-camp, and in future was hardly ever absent from his side.

Still, as the Baron slowly acquired our language, his eagerness and warmth of temper would frequently involve him in difficulties. On such occasions, after exhausting all the execrations he could think of in German and French, he would call upon his faithful aid for assistance. "Venez, Walker, mon ami ! Sacre, de gaucherie of des badauts, je ne puis plus. I can curse dem no more."

A temporary department of inspection was organized, and the Baron was placed at its head. Trained under so expert a tactician as the great

Frederic, he was well qualified for the service and entered upon it with great earnestness. From the moment that instruction began, no time or pains were spared to promote the object he had in view. Whenever the troops were to manœuvre, and this was every fair day, the Baron rose at three o'clock in the morning, and, while the servant dressed his hair, he smoked, and drank one cup of strong coffee. At sunrise he was on horseback, and, with or without his suite, galloped to the parade ground. There was no waiting for a tardy aid, and one who came late was sufficiently punished by a reproachful look for the neglect of duty.

The labor of inspection was always performed with the utmost care. Dr. Thacher in his "Military Journal" describes a scene, showing how great attention was paid to the minutest details. "The troops were paraded in a single line, with shouldered arms, every officer in his particular station. The Baron first reviewed the line in this position, passing in front with a scrutinizing eye; after which he took into his hand the musket and accoutrements of every soldier, examining them with particular accuracy and precision, applauding or condemning, according to the condition in which he found them. He required, that the musket and bayonet should exhibit the brightest polish; not a spot of rust, or defect in any part, could elude his vigilance. He inquired also into the conduct of the officers towards their men, censuring every fault, and applauding every meritorious action. Next, he required of me, as surgeon, a list of the sick, with a particular statement of their accommodations and mode of treatment and even visited some of the sick in their cabins.” *

The value of Steuben's services was soon apparent, in the improved condition of the troops, and was fully appreciated by Washington. On the 30th of April, when the Baron had been with the army but a few weeks, the Commander-in-chief wrote to Congress, attesting his merits in strong terms, and recommending him to receive immediately a permanent appointment. The following is an extract from the letter.

“I should do injustice, if I were to be longer silent with regard to the merits of Baron Steuben. His knowledge of his profession, added to the zeal which he has discovered since he began upon the functions of his office, leads me to consider him as an acquisition to the service, and to recommend him to the attention of Congress. His expectations with respect to rank extend to that of major-general. His finances, he ingenuously confesses, will not admit of his serving without the incidental emoluments; and Congress, I presume, from his character, and their own knowledge of him, will without difficulty gratify him in these particulars."

In conformity with this recommendation, the Baron, on the 5th of May, was appointed inspector-general of the army, with the rank of major-general; his pay to commence at the time of his joining the army. The department of inspection, which hitherto had been on a temporary footing, was now arranged on a permanent basis. Two ranks of inspectors were appointed; the lowest were charged with the inspection of brigades, and were chosen by the field-officers of the body to which they belonged. Over these were placed, as sub-inspectors, five officers with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. Among these were two French gentlemen, Ternant and Fleury, whose knowledge of both French and English made them necessary assistants to Baron Steuben.

The duty of the inspectors was to superintend the exercise and discipline of the troops, and to assist in the execution of all field manœuvres, especially in time of action. They reviewed and inspected the number and condition of the men, and the state of their arms and accoutrements, and reported to the Commander-in-chief any loss or damage, and by what means it had occurred. To this end, they were furnished with blank returns, so that minute accounts were kept, and not a brush or picker could be missing without the responsibility for its loss falling upon an individual.

These various arrangements were projected and matured with great labor by Steuben himself, and in their operation were productive of the happiest effects. Much unnecessary expense was avoided, and habits of order and carefulness were introduced throughout the army.

In the exercise and discipline of the troops, the plans of the Baron were equally successful. The European systems were too minute and complicated to be literally adopted, and were therefore varied and accommodated with great skill to the condition of the army. The regimental officers had written instructions relative to their several functions, and the manœuvres were illustrated by a company which the Baron himself trained.

Much embarrassment was experienced in carrying the system into effect, from the want of clothing and arms. Colonel Fleury, who had been sent to Wilmington to discipline the troops under General Smallwood, writes to Steuben on the 13th of May, giving a mournful picture of the condition of the troops. Many of them, from their utter nudity, could not appear on the ground. "Most of the recruits are unprovided with shirts, and the only garment they possess is a blanket elegantly twined about them. You may judge, Sir, how much this apparel graces their appearance on parade."

Notwithstanding such difficulties, the success of Baron Steuben's efforts was such, that, little more than a year afterwards, in a letter to Dr Franklin at Paris, he wrote as follows respecting the condition of the troops.

"I leave it to your other correspondents to give you an account of the present state of our army. If they tell you, that our order and discipline equals that of the French and Prussian armies, do not believe them. But do not believe them either, if they compare our troops to those of the Pope; take a just medium between these two extremes. Though we are so young that we scarce begin to walk, we have already taken Stony Point and Paulus Hook, at the point of the bayonet, without firing a single shot. This is very premature; yet we still have many weaknesses which bespeak our infancy. We want, above all, the true meaning of the words liberty, independence, &c., that the child may not make use of them against his father, or the soldier against his officer." *

The Baron was particularly attentive to the personal appearance of the men, and never allowed any instance of care or negligence in this respect to pass without immediate praise or censure. On one occasion, when reviewing Colonel Jackson's regiment, he noticed in the ranks a very spruce young lad, handsomely formed, standing erect with a soldierly air, and his gun and equipments in perfect order. Patting him under the chin, to raise his head still more, the Baron viewed him with a smile, and asked him how old he was. "Seventeen, Sir." Steuben asked him several other questions, how long he had been a soldier, and whether he had a wife; then turning to the commander, said, "Colonel Jackson, this is one fine soldier in miniature."

Dr. Thacher relates another anecdote, which displays in a pleasing manner Steuben's rigid sense of justice. "I recollect, that at a review near Morristown, a Lieutenant Gibbons, a brave and good officer, was arrested on the spot, and ordered into the rear, for a fault, which it afterwards appeared another had committed. At a proper moment, the commander of the regiment came forward and informed the Baron of Mr. Gibbons's innocence, of his worth, and of his acute feelings under this unmerited disgrace. 'Desire Lieutenant Gibbons to come to the front, Colonel.' 'Sir,' said the Baron to the young gentleman, 'the fault which was made by throwing the line into confusion, might, in the presence of an enemy, have been fatal. I arrested you as its supposed author ; but I have reason to believe that I was mistaken, and that in this instance you were blameless. I ask your pardon ; return to your command. I would not deal unjustly by any, much less by one, whose character as an officer is so respectable.' All this passed with the Baron's hat off, the rain pouring on his venerable head."

Steuben was particularly anxious, that the higher officers should not think it beneath them to attend to the minutiae of the drill, even to instructing the men singly in the proper use of their arms. As we have seen, he trained one company himself, that it might serve as a model to the others, and that his example might have weight with his brother officers. Learning the more complicated manœuvres was necessarily postponed to the necessity of making the troops perfect in the simpler operations, and enabling them, on the field of battle, to display or fold a column, or change a front with ease and correctness. "We have not time," said Steuben, "to do all. The business is, to give our troops a relish for their trade, to make them feel a confidence in their own skill. Your officers, following the miserable British sergeant system, would think themselves degraded by an attention to the drill. But the time will come, when there will be a better mode of thinking. Then we will attend to turning out the toes."

This prophecy, observes one of his aids, was a year or two afterwards literally fulfilled. "Do you see that, Sir?" said Steuben, "there is your colonel, instructing that awkward recruit. I thank God for that."

On the 18th of June, Baron Steuben left the encampment to visit Congress at Yorktown. He carried with him a highly complimentary letter from Washington to the President of Congress. He had made very extensive arrangements in the army, and his object was now to obtain a sanction of his proceedings from the Board of War. Having succeeded in this end, he returned to the army, to take his share of active duty in the campaign of 1778.

Late in June of this year the British troops evacuated Philadelphia, and a council of war was held, in the American army, to decide upon the propriety of attacking them in their retreat. The general opinion was in favor of sending a detachment to attack the enemy's rear, while the main body should take a proper position, to act as circumstances might require. But opinions differed respecting the strength of the detachment. Steuben, with others, was in favor of a strong body being sent for this purpose, and their views coincided with the judgment of Washington.

The arrangement was carried into effect, and it produced the battle of Monmouth, which was fought on the 28th of June. To the valuable improvements, which Steuben had introduced into all the ranks of the army, among other causes, the successful issue of this action is undoubtedly to be ascribed. Colonel Hamilton declared, that he had never known nor conceived the value of military discipline until that day.

As he had no command in the line, Steuben was employed during the action in forming the troops and reconnoitring the enemy. In this last service, he narrowly escaped being taken. His report to Washington of the unaccountable retreat of the van, commanded by General Lee, called forth some expressions from that officer, of which the Baron, prompt to take offence, demanded immediate explanation. Lee was already involved in difficulties enough, and he made the required apology in satisfactory terms.

It is pleasant to see the little courtesies of life exchanged between members of contending armies. We find Steuben writing to his countryman, General Knyphausen, then serving under Sir Henry Clinton, and requesting him to extend some favors to Mr. Garoutti, a young gentleman who had been made prisoner by the British. In a very polite reply, Knyphausen informed the Baron, that after some search he had discovered the person in question, had supplied him with necessaries and every thing that he desired, and would take care, that he should be included in the first general exchange of prisoners. Such little events as this alleviate the painful feelings that naturally arise, when we see those who were born on the same soil, engaged in opposite parties in war, and both in the service of strangers.

In July of this year, Steuben became desirous of exchanging his office of inspector-general for a command of the same rank in the regular line. As his labors had established the department of inspection on a regular footing, and no other duty now remained to him but that of a general superintendence, he naturally wished for a more active life, and an opportunity to acquire fame by commanding troops on distinct operations. Circumstances had enabled Washington to gratify this wish to a small extent. When the main army marched from Brunswic, as there were but few major-generals, and most of the brigadiers were in attendance at the court-martial held for the trial of General Lee, the Baron was appointed to conduct one wing of the army to the North River.

Though this arrangement was temporary, and so expressed in the general orders, it created some uneasiness among the brigadier-generals. They had willingly seen the rank of major-general given to Steuben, because, as he was appointed to a distinct department, it could not interfere with their own claims to promotion. But they did not wish to have the number of superior officers in actual service increased, as it would diminish their own chance of rising by seniority.

Perplexities of this kind were continually multiplying around the Commander-in-chief, and nothing but his great prudence enabled him to parry them, without any serious injury resulting to the service. When Steuben left the army to lay his desire before Congress, Washington wrote in the plainest terms to the President of that body. After bearing the most ample testimony to the merits of the Baron, he declared himself altogether averse to the claim, which could not be granted, without serious difficulties being the immediate result.

But, as he opposed the Baron's wishes in this respect, so he coincided entirely with them in another. A doubt had arisen respecting the Baron's supremacy in his own department. His commission made him inspector-general to the whole army. But Monsieur Neuville had received a commission expressed in similar terms for the army then commanded by Gates, and under this he denied any subordination to Steuben.

Congress accepted the advice of Washington in both respects. They confirmed the Baron's absolute authority in the department of inspection, but passed silently over his request to be transferred to the line. After fairly making the attempt, Steuben was discreet and disinterested enough to let the matter rest, and apply himself with new zeal to his old duties. Congress requested him to repair to Rhode Island, and give his advice and assistance to General Sullivan in the attack, which was then meditated on the British troops in that quarter.

In accordance with this request, Steuben set off immediately, but arrived too late to have any share in Sullivan's active operations. The French fleet, under D'Estaing, which was designed to coöperate with the land forces, had been obliged to sail for Boston to repair the injury received in a violent storm, and the troops were so much disheartened by this event, that they deserted in great numbers. Sullivan was compelled to break up his camp before Newport, and retire to the northern part of the island, and thence, after an indecisive engagement, to the main land. After remaining with Sullivan for some time, to assist him in getting the troops into order, and making the necessary arrangements to prevent the incursions of the British, Steuben returned to the main army.

In the choice of aids and officers immediately connected with him in his department, the Baron was peculiarly fortunate. The little family that they formed for him, and the mutual affection and confidence that prevailed among its members, gave him, bachelor as he was, and residing in a strange land, all the comforts of domestic life. He was in the habit of breakfasting in his own apartment, but frequently paid the mess-room of his officers a visit while they were engaged at that meal, which was always composed of the best materials that could be obtained, at the Baron's sole cost. On such occasions, he did not suffer his affection for the men to interfere with his zeal for the service. If either of the gentlemen had protracted his morning's sleep too long to appear at that time in trim to mount on horseback, he was immediately despatched on duty, without the slightest regard to the breakfast table. But the Baron was seldom driven to this necessity.

Walker and Du Ponceau have been already mentioned. Ternant had been sent to the south, to introduce the system of inspection and discipline among the troops commanded by General Howe, and afterwards by General Lincoln. He was in the army of Howe at the time that officer was defeated in Georgia. This disaster, the unhealthiness of the climate, and the difficulty of introducing any system into an army, which was one day composed of half-disciplined troops, and the next of militia not disciplined at all, seem to have disgusted him with the situation. In his letters to the Baron, written in a deep spirit of affection and respect, he betrays his earnest desire to return to the north, and serve again under the eye of his old commander.

Captain William North was another of the aids, and between him and the Baron existed an attachment like that of father and son. This officer had served as a volunteer, in 1775, under General Arnold, in the expedition through the wilderness from Kennebec to Canada. He afterwards received the command of a company in Colonel Jackson's regiment, and served in that capacity till he was appointed aid-de-camp to Baron Steuben. Deeply sensible of the kindness with which he had been treated in this relation, and of the many tokens of affection that he had received in other respects, he continued, during the long period in which he survived Steuben, to cherish his memory with almost idolatrous regard.

I have thought, that this little account of the members of the Baron's family would not be misplaced here, as it throws a strong light on his excellent character. No ordinary qualities of mind and heart are required to create such a deep-rooted affection to a superior officer and a foreigner, as was manifested by Ternant, Walker, and North towards Steuben. To behold such kindly feelings springing up in the harsh soil of a camp, and flourishing in despite of the cold air of jealous rivalry and a punctilious regard to forms, which usually prevail in such a quarter, is a pleasing but rare occurrence.

During the autumn of 1778, the Baron was occupied in a work of much importance, for the completion and regular observance of the rules of discipline and inspection. Hitherto, the system had been extended to the troops acting in separate and remote sections of the country, by means of officers despatched for the purpose, who had previously learned and practised the rules, under the eye of Steuben himself. To this end, Ternant had been sent to the southern army, where he was soon afterwards joined by L'Enfant. To introduce more perfect uniformity, so that the troops when brought together might not be perplexed by little differences in their previous mode of training, it seemed advisable, that a manual should be prepared and printed for distribution among the proper officers. It was especially requisite for the guidance of officers employed in raising recruits and sending them in small parties to the main army, that they might not arrive wholly unpractised in their new duties.

Baron Steuben engaged in the work at the request of Washington and the Board of War. The difficulties in the way of executing the project were great. From his imperfect acquaintance with the English language, the work was originally composed in French, and the manuscript then translated into English by his aids or persons connected with the War Department, who were not well acquainted with military phrases and duties. No treatise on military science could be obtained, to serve as a basis for the work. Every thing had to be drawn from the Baron's recollections of the Prussian system, and then modified to suit the peculiar condition of the American troops.

It is no small praise of a work executed under such disadvantages, that it was immediately approved by the Commander-in-chief, relied upon for direction during the remainder of the war, and that it continued to be in use as the only authority for disciplining the militia of the several States down to a late period. For this purpose, the work was republished in many of the States.

It was written with such conciseness, that, though it contained minute directions on a great variety of subjects, it was comprised in a small volume of about one hundred and fifty pages. The completed manuscript was submitted to the perusal of Washington on the 26th of February 1779. Congress adopted it by a resolution dated on the 29th of March. But the publication was so much delayed, from the want of engravers competent to execute the plates, that the Baron's patience was severely tried. Colonel Pickering, who superintended the passage of the work through the press, wrote to Steuben, announcing its publication, on the 19th of June. The following is an extract from the letter.

"I am obliged by your kind expressions of friendship and esteem, and shall ever account it an honor to be ranked among your friends. Should

I again discover marks of extreme impatience and even asperity in the inspector-general, I will impute them to his anxiety to introduce a perfect order and discipline in the army, and to his zeal for securing the safety and independence of America."

The Baron was precise, and apt to be sufficiently testy about delays and imperfections for which he could not account. But his general goodness of heart is attested, not only by the enthusiastic attachment which his officers bore to him, but by many little incidents, which, trifling as they are, form the most satisfactory proof of an amiable disposition. An anecdote, related more than half a century after the event happened, by Major Popham, who became a member of Steuben's family in 1781, will illustrate this point.

The Baron brought with him from Europe a beautiful Italian grey-hound, named Azor, to which he was much attached. This dog was a genius in his way. He had been instructed in music, and often performed his part on the gamut, much more to his own and his master's delight, than to the satisfaction of the bystanders. "In the month of August, 1782," writes Major Popham, "the Baron had occasion to review the invalid corps at Fishkill. He and I rode out in his carriage for this purpose, and returning in the afternoon, Azor in attendance, we were over taken by a violent storm, which made the roads exceedingly muddy. The day being warm, the leeward glass of the carriage was put down. While the coachman pressed his horses to their full speed, the rascally Italian, unwilling to bear any longer the pattering of the rain, made a flying spring through the window, and lighted directly on our new regimentals, which we had purchased but a short time before in Philadelphia. Of course, both of us were reduced to the most deplorable plight. My ire rose very fast, but the Baron's temper was unmoved. He laughed very heartily, and contented himself with telling Azor that he was a rascal, and making him crouch down at his feet."

Our readers will pardon another anecdote of Azor, though a little out of place. I quote from a manuscript communication of Mr. Du Ponceau, who, as we have seen, accompanied Steuben on his voyage from France. "This dog was fond of music; and, when on board the ship, he would listen with great attention and apparent pleasure to the sailors' songs. While they or anybody else was singing, he stood all the time arrectis auribus, not losing a single note. Unfortunately, Captain Landais was also fond of music, but had the most dismal, and at the same time, false voice, that nature ever bestowed on man for the torment of delicate ears. Nevertheless, the good captain took it into his head to learn vocal music, and for want of a better, I was selected to be his teacher. We now began to go through the musical scale, do, re, mi, fa, &c.; but poor Azor, dilettante as he was, could not bear the harsh sounds that issued from my pupil's voice. As soon as we began the gamut, he set up such lamentable yells that we were soon compelled to abandon our melodious exercise. The dog, nevertheless, continued to listen to other music, and did not lose his taste for that delightful art. But the gamut he never afterwards would bear; the moment any one began with do, re, mi, fa, he commenced his terrible howl, and nothing would quiet him but some tune more to his taste. The captain pronounced, that the dog had no ear for music; but he was greatly mortified, that the animal's taste did not coincide with his own. The passengers, however, were of a different opinion; and Azor had my warm thanks for relieving me from the painful task to which our gallant commander had subjected me."

On the 15th of August, 1779, Steuben left the main army on a visit to Providence, in order to introduce among the troops under General Gates the rules, which had been adopted in the main body. He remained at Providence but a short period, being ordered to Boston to receive, and accompany to head-quarters, the Chevalier de la Luzerne, who had just landed as minister from France to Congress. The route assigned for the journey lay through New Haven and Fairfield, in Connecticut. But, on the 8th of September, we find Colonel Hamilton writing in some anxiety to Steuben, to induce him to change the route; for, as the British had troops on Long Island, a body of men might easily be thrown across the Sound, and the whole party might have their dreams disagreeably interrupted by a call to attend the levee of Sir Henry Clinton. The journey was made, however, without accident, and the Chevalier was received at the main army with the honors due to his station.

On this and other occasions, the Baron had received more than the regular salary of his office, as established by Congress. The nature of his duties, which required him frequently to travel from one part of the army to another, occasioned extra expense, and, in the opinion of Washington, justified an extra allowance. But there were other causes which increased Steuben's pecuniary difficulties.

His hand was ever open to the calls of distress, and on all occasions he found it difficult to resist his inclination to give, or to have any prudent regard to the extent of his means. As it does not appear that he received any remittance from Europe during the war, he was entirely dependent on his allowance from Congress for his own support and the exercise of his liberal feelings. General Washington was sensible of his merit, and urged the authorities on all proper occasions in his behalf. In truth, considering the poverty of the country, he was treated with a commendable degree of liberality. But hardly any sum was too great for his necessities.

Never did a review pass, without rewards being given to soldiers, whose attention to the state of their arms and equipments was most conspicuous. Never was his table unfurnished with guests, if furnished with provisions. Officers of the higher ranks, men most prominent for their attention to duty, were principally his guests; but the gentlemen of his family were desired to complete the list with others of inferior rank. "Poor fellows," said he; "they have field officers' stomachs, without their pay or rations."

On one occasion at the South, he sold a part of his camp equipage, in order to give an entertainment to the officers of the allied army. "We are constantly feasted by the French," said he, "without their receiving any invitation in return, except from head-quarters. I can stand it no longer. I will give one grand dinner to our allies, should I eat my soup with a wooden spoon for ever after."

The month of February, 1780, was spent by Baron Steuben at Philadelphia, in concerting measures with the Board of War, to place the army on a proper footing for the campaign of the ensuing summer. From the peculiar manner in which he had been employed, he could furnish accurate information respecting the state and number of the troops, and suggest what steps were requisite to meet the coming exigencies of the war. As a large force was expected from France in the course of the summer, it was absolutely necessary, that the strength and effectiveness of the American forces should be increased, that the allies might not be discouraged at the first sight of the army with which they were to coöperate. Steuben was fortunate enough, in the measures he proposed, to obtain the approbation of Washington.

The return of Lafayette to the United States in April, bringing intelligence that a naval and land armament might soon be expected from France, caused the preparations already commenced, to be carried on with renewed vigor. A circular letter was despatched to the governors of the several States, urging them to complete their quotas of troops, to provide magazines of provisions and arms, and prepare for calling out the militia at any moment.

In this way, though the proceedings of the States were dilatory to the last degree, much was accomplished. But unfortunately, from the arrival of a reinforcement to the British fleet at New York, the French lost their superiority at sea, and all the extraordinary preparations availed nothing towards the attainment of any considerable object. The French under Count Rochambeau landed in Rhode Island, but were sufficiently occupied in preparations for their own defence.

Baron Steuben continued at West Point, though not in actual command at that post, to give his advice and assistance to General Howe, when an attack from the British was apprehended. As many French officers, who were old acquaintances of the Baron, visited this post, he had much pride in showing them the discipline and military expertness, which the American troops had attained under his instructions. Many parades were ordered, and the allied officers remarked with astonishment the adroitness and silence, with which the manœuvres were performed. This last particular excited the more surprise, as the French troops were noisy in their marches and evolutions. "Noise?" exclaimed the Baron to General Montmorency, who was remarking upon this point, "I do not know where the noise should come from, when even my brigadiers dare not open their mouths, but to repeat my orders."

On a subsequent occasion, when a violent storm had caused a grand exhibition to be postponed, Steuben was asked by one of the French generals, who had retired with him to his marquee, what manœuvres he had intended to perform. On being told, the officer mentioned an addition of some difficulty, which he had seen practised by the Prussians in Silesia. "But we do not expect you to equal the veteran army of the King of Prussia. All in good time."

"The time shall be next week," said the Baron, after his guests had retired; "I will save the gentlemen, who have not been in Silesia, the trouble of going any farther than Verplanck's Point for instruction." The order for the review was brought, and one of the aids wrote, as Steuben dictated. The appointed day came, and, amid a large concourse of officers, the proposed evolutions were performed with great precision.

The Baron was with the main army in the months of September and October, 1780, a period signalized by the treason of Arnold, and the capture of André. By a wise precaution, the court for the trial of this unfortunate captive was composed in part of foreign officers, Lafayette and Steuben being appointed members. Their decision sealed the fate of André, and crowned the infamy of the wretched being, who, as the cause of sacrificing a brother officer and a man of honor, must have been as much detested in the British as in the American camp.

Steuben never failed to manifest the utmost abhorrence of the name and character of the traitor. An anecdote, told by one of his aids, displays the depth of his feelings on this point. As he was reviewing Colonel Sheldon's regiment of light horse, on the call of the muster-roll, the offensive appellation of Benedict Arnold met his ear. The person who bore the name, a private, was immediately called to the front. He was a fine looking man, with his horse and equipments in perfect order. "Change your name, brother soldier," said the Baron; "you are too respectable to bear the name of a traitor." "What name shall I take, General?" "Take any other; mine is at your service." The offer was gladly accepted, the odious appellation erased from the roll, and that of Frederic William Steuben inserted in its place. As a christening present, the Baron immediately settled upon him a perpetual pension of five dollars a month, and, after some years, the gift of a considerable tract of land was added. After the close of the war, the soldier met Steuben, and informed him that he was well settled, and had a wife and son. "I have called my son after you, Sir." "I thank you, my friend; what name have you given the boy?" "I called him Baron; what else could I call him?"

The ardent desire of Steuben to engage in more active service, with a separate command, was now to be gratified. The defeat of Gates at

Camden, on the 16th of August, had entirely exposed the southern country to the operations of the army under Cornwallis. The most strenuous exertions were required to prevent its entire loss. In October, General Greene was appointed to the command at the South, and all the troops raised in the southern States were destined for his support. Baron Steuben was ordered to accompany Greene, to render aid in arranging and disciplining the raw troops, who were to form the bulk of the army. He was also appointed to preside at the court of inquiry into the conduct of Gates; but this affair was delayed from day to day, and finally suffered to drop.

General Greene arrived at Richmond about the middle of November. He immediately perceived, that Virginia could be defended only in the Carolinas; that, if the British forces in those States were not kept in constant action, the whole country up to the Potomac must fall into their power. The eastern part of Virginia was extremely unfavorable for operations against an enemy, who had the command at sea. Intersected by numerous rivers and creeks, difficult for troops to pass, the British could send a naval force far into the country, and effectually hem in their opponents.

With these views, Greene resolved to leave Baron Steuben the command in Virginia, and to go himself to the southward, to cope with Cornwallis. The Baron was instructed to use the utmost exertions in enlisting troops in every part of the State, to form and discipline them as much as possible, and then to send them, together with what stores and provisions he could collect, to the support of Greene. The British general Leslie still occupied Portsmouth, but with a force too small to act on the offensive. Steuben received discretionary powers to act against him, but was advised to remain chiefly on the defensive, with the view of forwarding every man, that could be spared, to the Carolinas. Definite instructions were also given him respecting the establishment of armories and the conduct of the ordnance department.

An odious task was thus imposed upon Steuben at the beginning, and one which required no small judgment and prudence, as well as military skill, to perform with success. At the risk of creating dissatisfaction, he was obliged to disfurnish the State for the time being, in the hope of securing its permanent safety. Knowing their dangerous situation, the Virginians could not willingly behold the voluntary diminution of their resources. In a letter to Governor Jefferson, Greene explained his views respecting the conduct of the war, and labored to convince him of their propriety. He recommended the Baron in strong terms, and claimed for him the aid and coöperation of the State executive.

The departure of General Leslie from the State, on the 24th of November, left at liberty for other operations, a body of troops amounting to about nine hundred. Steuben ordered them to Petersburg, that they might be equipped and sent immediately to the South. But they were found so destitute of necessaries, that with great labor only four hundred could be fitted out and despatched under Colonel Green. The others were ordered to Chesterfield Court-House, and the Baron exerted himself to procure for them articles of equipment.

The resources of the State had been greatly exhausted, and, with all the exertions of Governor Jefferson, recruits came in but slowly, and the proper stores were with difficulty collected. The Baron's zeal did not permit him on every occasion to act with proper mildness and caution.

At one time, a man on horseback, with a well-mounted lad in attendance, rode up, and, introducing himself to the Baron as a colonel in the militia, said that he had brought a recruit. Steuben thanked him, at first, but his countenance changed, when he found, that the recruit was no other than the boy in attendance. A sergeant was ordered to measure him, and found, when his shoes were taken off, something by which his height had been increased. The Baron patted the child's head, with a hand trembling with rage, and asked him how old he was. He was very young, quite a child. "Sir," said Steuben to the militia colonel, "do you think me a rascal?" "Oh no, Baron, I do not." "Then, Sir, I think you are one, an infamous scoundrel, thus to attempt to cheat your country." Then speaking to an officer at his side; "Take off this colonel's spurs, place him in the ranks, and tell General Greene from me, that I have sent him a man able to serve, instead of an infant whom he would basely have made his substitute. Go, my boy; carry the colonel's horse and spurs to his wife; make my respects to her, and tell her, that her husband has gone to fight, as an honest citizen should, for the liberty of his country."

This was rather a high-handed proceeding; and the officer commanding the detachment, fearing the consequences, suffered the man to escape. He immediately applied to the Governor for redress; but the purity of Steuben's motives was known, and the matter was passed over in silence.

The quota of troops fixed by Congress to complete the Virginia line amounted nearly to six thousand. But the Assembly, after much debate, voted to raise only three thousand, and the draft was appointed for the 10th of February, 1781. Before any thing was done, however, the attention of Baron Steuben and the energies of the State were directed to another object by a new invasion of the enemy, commanded by the traitor Arnold

On the 30th of December, information was transmitted to Governor Jefferson, that a naval armament, amounting in all to twenty-seven sail, had entered the capes of the Chesapeake. General Nelson was immediately sent to the lower country to the north of James River, with orders to call out the militia there, and act as exigencies should require.

Steuben was at Chesterfield, and did not receive certain news of the enemy's approach till the 2d of January. From the distressed situation of the Continental troops, at that place, only one hundred and fifty men could be fitted out, who were sent to protect the public stores at Petersburg, then supposed to be the destination of Arnold. The Baron afterwards waited on the Governor and Council at Richmond, and it was determined by them to issue a call for four thousand militia.

The British passed up James River without opposition, till they arrived, on the 3d of January, at Hood's, where a small battery had been erected. A few shot were fired at them here; but the garrison, amounting only to seventy men, were obliged to leave the post, when the enemy landed some troops and destroyed the guns. On the 4th, they landed at Westover, twenty-five miles below Richmond, which now appeared to be the object of attack. No force had as yet been collected, as the call for the militia was issued only two days before. But great exertions were made to remove the records, arms, and military stores to the south side of the river, which object was in a great degree accomplished. Most of the stores were sent to Westham, seven miles from Richmond, where they were ferried across the river, and guarded by the small body of Continentals.

Arnold had with him about sixteen hundred effective men. Of these, he landed nine hundred at Westover, and with them commenced his march, on the afternoon of the 4th, to Richmond, which place he reached at noon on the following day. Baron Steuben despatched one or two hundred militia, all that could be collected, to harass the British on the march, but the service was ill performed, and they entered the capital without the loss of a man. Arnold with five hundred men remaining in the town, Colonel Simcoe with the remainder pushed forward to Westham, where he burned a valuable foundry, boring-mill, laboratory, and some smaller buildings. Five brass four-pounders, which had been sunk in the river, were discovered, raised, and carried off, and six tons of powder were thrown into the water. But, as they had no means of crossing the river, the major part of the stores were out of their reach, and Simcoe returned immediately to Richmond.

Arnold sent a flag to Steuben, offering not to burn the town, if the ships should be allowed to pass up unmolested, and carry off the tobacco, which was there deposited. This proposition was rejected; and the enemy, concluding to leave the tobacco, after burning the public buildings and plundering many private houses, commenced their retreat to Westover, where they arrived on the 7th. In about forty-eight hours, they had passed thirty miles into the country, occupied the capital of the State, destroyed much public property, and returned to their shipping without the loss of a man.

Deeply sensible of the insult thus received, Steuben strained every nerve to collect troops, and harass the British on their passage down the river. He had drawn what force he could to Manchester, with a view to prevent them from passing to the south side of the river, where they might have committed serious damage. General Smallwood, with a small party of militia, had defeated an attempt made by a detachment of the enemy to pass up the Appomatox, a river emptying into James River, a little above Westover, and destroy some private shipping.

Rightly judging, that Arnold's force would land again at Hood's, on their passage down, Steuben ordered Colonel Clarke to form an ambuscade with two hundred militia, at a short distance from the landing-place. On the 10th, the shipping anchored at the place, and a party of five hundred men landed, who drove in the American picket.

When they came within forty paces of the ambuscade, the militia poured in a general fire, which killed seven men and wounded twenty-three others. The British returned the fire without effect, and then pushed forward with fixed bayonets, when the militia immediately fled. The party reëmbarked, carrying with them the guns, which they had disabled at their former landing.

Simcoe had been detached with a party of horse to Charles City Court-House, where he surprised a body of militia, killed one, and took several prisoners. In this way, Arnold's force fell slowly down the river, occasionally landing parties to destroy public and private property, but affording no opportunity to Steuben to make an attack with any prospect of success. At Cobham, they carried off some tobacco, and at Smithfield and Mackay's Mills, they destroyed some stores. Parties of militia followed them to each place, but in too small numbers to hazard an attack.

On the 20th the fleet reached Portsmouth which Arnold proceeded to fortify, in order to establish it as a permanent post. He had been reinforced by three transports, and the troops under his command now amounted to two thousand. On the other hand, the four thousand militia were now collected; but, as economy was a material object, one fourth of these were dismissed. With the remainder, Steuben made the proper arrangements to confine the enemy within the narrowest limits, and to give every practicable protection to the inhabitants.

General Lawson, with nine hundred militia and a party of horse, occupied several strong passes in the vicinity of Suffolk, a town lying about fifteen miles west of Portsmouth. Muhlenburg was stationed at Cabin Point, with Armand's corps and eight hundred infantry, to support Lawson. General Nelson, with one thousand foot and a small number of horse, occupied Williamsburg, to protect the stores at that place.

Baron Steuben's services during this predatory incursion of the enemy were fully appreciated by the State executive. The following is an extract from a letter of Governor Jefferson, dated the 10th of January, to the President of Congress. "Baron Steuben has descended from the dignity of his proper command to direct our smallest movements. His vigilance has in a great measure supplied the want of force, in preventing the enemy from crossing the river, the consequences of which might have been very fatal. He has been assiduously employed in preparing equipments for the militia, as they assembled, pointing them to a proper object, and in other offices of a good commander."

Nothing displays more strongly the ardent attachment of the Americans to the cause in which they were engaged, than their detestation of the traitor Arnold, and the strong desire they manifested to get possession of his person. His conduct after the act of treason inflamed these feelings in no small degree. Hated by those whom he had betrayed, and an object of suspicion to the party he had joined, who never trusted him in command without placing him under the supervision of inferior officers, he embraced every opportunity, by acts of wanton cruelty and insult, to show the reckless nature of his feelings, and to sever the last tie, which bound him to his countrymen. Even Washington seems to have shared the general desire to seize the traitor, in a greater degree than was warranted by the real importance of the measure to the interests of the country. We hardly need to allude to the gallant attempt of Sergeant Champe to carry off Arnold from the midst of the British troops in New York. A similar project was set on foot about this time in Virginia.

It appears, that the plan was concerted between Jefferson and Baron Steuben. On the 31st of January, the former wrote to General Muhlenburg, urging the importance and feasibility of the plan, and requesting him to provide for its execution. "Having peculiar confidence in the men from the western side of the mountains," said he, "I meant, as soon as they should come down, to get the enterprise proposed to a chosen number of them, such, whose courage and whose fidelity would be above all doubt. Your perfect knowledge of those men, personally, and my confidence in your discretion, induce me to ask you to pick from among them proper characters, in such numbers as you think best ; to reveal to them our desire ; and to engage them to seize and bring off this greatest of all traitors. Whether this may be best effected by their going in as friends, and awaiting their opportunity, or otherwise, is left to themselves. The smaller the number the better, so that they may be sufficient to manage him. Every necessary precaution on their part must be used, to prevent a discovery of their design by the enemy. I will undertake, if they are successful in bringing him off alive, that they shall receive five thousand guineas among them."

An order was enclosed from Baron Steuben, authorizing Muhlenburg to dispose what force he might think necessary, so as to cover the enterprise, and secure the retreat of the party. The bearer of the letter, who was privy to the plan, undertook to provide suitable men to act as guides.

The project unfortunately failed, owing to the extraordinary precautions which Arnold took for his own security. He remained close in his quarters while at Portsmouth, and never unguardedly exposed his person.

The invasion of the State caused a serious delay of the measures projected for furnishing General Greene with additional supplies. Much of the provision that had been collected was consumed, and many of the arms and stores were taken or destroyed. By a law of the State, no county was obliged to draft men for the Continental lines, while its militia were in actual service; and, as most of the militia from the lower counties were now in action, the recruiting operations were necessarily postponed. It was resolved, to send every regular soldier immediately to the Carolinas, and to trust the protection of the State against Arnold's force, entirely to the militia. Five hundred Continentals still remained at Chesterfield Court-House, but so destitute of clothing and other necessities, that they could not act, even in their immediate vicinity.

In the mean time, Greene was making continual and pressing calls for support, representing the safety of all the southern states as dependent on the reception of supplies from Virginia. In his exertions to satisfy these demands, the Baron was sometimes unfortunate. Full of zeal himself, he could not perceive all the difficulties in the way of compliance with his requisitions, or allow for the natural reluctance of the Virginians to diminish their resources, when a portion of the territory was actually occupied by the British. The asper-

ity of some of his communications to the State authorities furnished many with a pretext for turning a deaf ear to claims, which they might otherwise have felt obliged to grant. Jefferson seems to have entered into Steuben's character, and, feeling a deep respect for the man, to have exerted himself in lessening the difficulties of his situation. Greene and Washington both wrote in conciliatory terms to Steuben, to allay his irritation, and assure him of their confidence and support.

The double office of attending to the collection of supplies for the south, and directing the operations of the militia against Arnold, demanded incessant activity and vigilance. An accidental event at the north required Steuben to provide for more active operations.

Early in February a storm disabled the British fleet, which had hitherto blocked up the French vessels in Newport, and enabled M. Destouches to detach a sixty-four and two frigates, under M. de Tilly, to the Chesapeake, to act with the Virginia militia against Portsmouth. The capture of Arnold's naval force, it was hoped, would oblige his troops, cut off from all power of retreat, to surrender to Steuben. Unfortunately, Arnold received notice of the plan, and was able to draw his vessels so high up the Elizabeth river, that the shallowness of the water prevented the approach of the French ; and M. de Tilly, having captured a British frigate and two privateers, returned, on the 24th of February, to Newport.

The great importance of capturing Arnold, and dislodging the British from Virginia, induced Washington to press the French to a greater effort. Destouches finally determined to proceed with the whole squadron to the Chesapeake, with a body of eleven hundred French infantry on board. As Steuben had recently sent to General Greene a second detachment of regular troops, amounting to four hundred men, none but militia remained in the State, and these were deemed insufficient to act effectually with the French. A detachment of twelve hundred men from the main army, then stationed on the Hudson River, was therefore ordered to Virginia, under Lafayette, who was to command all the forces destined for the attack of Portsmouth.

The arrangements were made with great skill, and every thing seemed to promise success. Lafayette received positive orders to grant no terms to Arnold, which should insure him against the punishment due to his treason. By rapid marches, Lafayette reached the Head of Elk on the 3d of March, and there for a time awaited news from the French fleet. He wrote to Governor Jefferson and Steuben, urging the former to provide heavy ordnance and scows to transport them across the rivers, and the latter to keep the British force constantly hemmed in by the militia. With the native delicacy of his character, he forbore to assume the command over Baron Steuben, until called to act immediately against the enemy.

The latter was again exposed to deep mortification from having relied too much on the promises of the State executive, and given to Lafayette too favorable an account of the supplies awaiting him in Virginia. In a letter to the Governor, dated the 9th of March, he wrote as follows. "In consequence of the assurances I received from government by Colonel Walker, I was weak enough to write to General Washington and the Marquis, that every thing was ready for the expedition. My credulity, however, is punished at the expense of my honor, and my only excuse is the confidence I had in government." The Marquis on his arrival was compelled to impress provisions and cattle, as the only means of providing for the army.

On the 20th of March, the hopes of all parties were excited to the highest pitch by the appearance in the bay of a fleet, conjectured to be that of the French. On the 23d they were doomed to learn the failure of these hopes, and the second escape of the prey, that seemed almost within their grasp. The vessels proved to be the English fleet under Arbuthnot, who had sailed from

New York two days after the departure of the French from Newport. The two fleets met near the entrance of the Chesapeake, and an action ensued, which, though indecisive in the main, induced Destouches to return, and the English vessels came up to Portsmouth. The troops under Lafayette gloomily retraced their steps to the northward, and Steuben returned to his old task, of watching the enemy, and forwarding supplies to General Greene.

Late in March, a reinforcement of two thousand English troops under General Phillips arrived at Portsmouth. As the magnitude of the British army now threatened the safety of the whole State, Lafayette received orders to take his force back, and assume the command in Virginia. His troops were wholly unprepared for a summer campaign at the south; but, by great exertions, and borrowing a large sum on his private credit from the merchants of Baltimore, they were put in tolerable trim.

Up to the middle of April, the enemy did nothing but send out small parties of Tories, under the direction of Arnold, who committed great excesses in the lower part of the State, plundering and burning the houses, and treating the inhabitants with wanton cruelty. On the 18th, a greater effort was made. Twenty-five hundred men under General Phillips sailed up James River, with the view of attacking Petersburg and Richmond. Simcoe with a small party entered Williamsburg, and destroyed some stores. The main body, on the 24th, landed at the junction of the Appomatox and James Rivers, and marched up the banks of the former towards Petersburg.

Baron Steuben was there with one thousand militia, to defend the city against twenty-three hundred regular troops. But his measures were so well taken, that he was able to dispute the ground more than two hours, during which time the enemy gained but one mile. They were twice broken before their superiority of numbers compelled Steuben to retreat, and assume a new position about twelve miles up the river. The loss was equal, amounting to about sixty killed and wounded on each side.

General Lafayette by forced marches had arrived at Richmond, and his presence prevented the enemy from making any attack upon that place. But they burned all the tobacco in the warehouses in Petersburg and the vicinity, and destroyed several public armed vessels and much private property at other points on the river. A small flotilla, originally collected to aid the operations designed against Portsmouth, was now stationed at Warwick, a few miles below Richmond. Arnold conducted a considerable detachment of the British force against it, and sent a flag to the commanding officer, requiring him to surrender. A defiance was returned ; but, as the enemy were enabled to bring some heavy artillery to a point of the shore within cannon-shot, the Virginians were compelled, after scuttling the vessels and setting them on fire, to escape to the opposite bank.

By the 1st of May, Lafayette and Steuben had collected such a considerable force, that Phillips dared not cross to the northern side of the river, but, collecting his detached parties, commenced his voyage down to Portsmouth. His expedition had caused great loss to the Americans, though by the destruction of private, more than of public property. On the 5th, when below Burwell's Ferry, he received despatches from Cornwallis, announcing the intention of that officer to enter Virginia, and requesting Phillips to assume a position at Petersburg, in order to form a junction. The fleet in consequence again sailed up the river.

Lafayette had received the same news ; and, aware of the importance of preventing a union, took his measures with great celerity to occupy Petersburg. But he was anticipated by Phillips, who entered the town on the 9th, and made prisoners of two officers, who had been sent thither by the Marquis to provide boats for the passage of his army. Defeated in this object, Lafayette established his camp at Wilton, a few miles below Richmond, on the south side of the river.

On the 13th the command of the enemy again devolved on Arnold, by the death of General Phillips. This last was an old and skilful officer, but he caused the inhabitants of the country, through which he passed, to experience to the full the miseries of war. His communications to the American commanders were couched in such insolent terms, that both Lafayette and Steuben informed him, that, if his letters continued to be in such a spirit, all intercourse must cease.

The proposed union of the British forces took place on the 20th, at Petersburg. It enters not into the plan of this sketch, to give any connected account of the very successful manœuvres by which Lafayette, with inferior numbers, avoided every effort of Cornwallis, during the summer, to bring him to an engagement, and yet remained constantly in the vicinity of the enemy, confining his operations, and protecting the country against his detached parties. In all his movements, he was actively supported by Steuben.

The Baron was now so unpleasantly involved with the State authorities, that he ardently desired permission to leave this scene of action, and join Greene in the Carolinas. Leave was actually granted him for this purpose; but the invasion by Cornwallis imperatively required his presence in Virginia, and he was obliged to remain.

At the Point of Fork, a tongue of land formed by the junction of the Fluvanna and Rivanna rivers, the head branches of the James, a State arsenal had been established, and a quantity of military stores collected. The post was guarded by Baron Steuben, with six hundred newly levied troops. Cornwallis, learning his situation, despatched Simcoe against him with five hundred regulars. Tarleton, with two hundred and fifty horse, was also ordered to proceed to Charlottesville, and thence to join Simcoe at the Point of Fork.

This double movement rendered Steuben's situation very perilous. As the British commander secured every person he met on his route, and advanced with great haste, the Baron received only exaggerated accounts of the enemy's force, and was induced to think only of retreat. He transported the stores to the south side of the Fluvanna, and when Simcoe appeared, on the 3d of June, only thirty of the rear-guard remained exposed, who were captured. But as the river was deep and unfordable, and all the boats had been secured, the main object of the British was frustrated.

In this state of things, Simcoe had recourse to stratagem. He occupied the heights opposite to Steuben's new station, and by displaying his troops to advantage, and kindling many fires during the night, induced the Americans to believe.

that the main army, headed by Cornwallis, had arrived. Under this impression, the Baron broke up his camp in the night, and commenced a precipitate retreat, leaving behind him a considerable quantity of stores. These were destroyed by a small detachment, who crossed the river the next morning in a few canoes.

The Pennsylvania line, consisting of eight hundred men, under General Wayne, had been sent from the north, to assist in the defence of Virginia. Lafayette effected a junction with them on the 10th of June, and on the 16th he was joined by Steuben with his little band. The army now amounted to four thousand, of whom one half were regulars. Yet it was still far inferior in number to the British, and the Marquis could only hang on the rear of his opponent, who was now retreating to the low country.

A partial action took place near Jamestown, on the 6th of July, in which the enemy did not make the most of their advantage. Cornwallis seemed to lose his spirit of enterprise, and to bend his attention only to establishing a strong post, which might serve as a convenient station for the English fleet. York and Gloucester, on opposite sides of York river, were selected for this purpose, and the troops were employed in fortifying them during the month of August. Lafayette encamped in the neighbourhood, and made such disposition of his strength, as to confine the enemy mainly within their works.

The autumn of this year was signalized by the march of the combined French and American army to Virginia, and the measures which led to the capitulation of Cornwallis, on the 18th of October. In the operations before York, Baron Steuben had a full and honorable share. Washington respected his indefatigable exertions, and soothed him under the disappointments he had suffered, by conferring upon him a command in the regular line. It was during the Baron's tour of duty in the trenches, that the negotiations for the surrender commenced. At the relieving hour the next morning, Lafayette approached with his division. The Baron refused to be relieved, assigning, as a reason, the etiquette in Europe, where the officer, who receives the overtures, remains on his post till the capitulation is signed or broken. The Marquis applied to the Commander-in-chief; but Steuben with his troops remained in the trenches, till the British flag was struck. Steuben was honorably noticed with other officers in the orders issued the day after the capitulation.

He returned with the main army to the northward, and continued at head-quarters till the close of the war, occupied in the discharge of his duties as inspector-general. Major North records, with much feeling, an incident, that occurred at this time, and which displays the benevolence and warmth of feeling, that ever marked the amiable character of Steuben.

When the army left Virginia, North was ill of a fever, and could not be removed. On the eve of departure, the Baron visited him, to inform him, that he would be left behind, but in a country where he had found the door of every house open to the call of distress. "The instant you are able," said he, "quit this deleterious situation. There is my sulkey, and here," handing him a single piece of gold, "is half what I possess in the world. God bless you, I can say no more." We hardly know whether to admire more the feeling evinced in such an act, or the honest gratitude, which prompted the narrator of the anecdote to leave it on record.

Another of his aids relates a fact, still more illustrative of the Baron's generous character. On his passage to Virginia, he was annoyed by the wailing of a child in the fore part of the vessel. He sent to know the cause, and was told, that it proceeded from a little negro boy, who had been purchased in New York by a southern gentleman, and carried away from his parents. He instantly directed North to ascertain the amount of the purchase money, and actually paid it out of his own slender funds, and carried the boy back to the city. One day after his return, the gentleman dined with him, and found him in great agitation. With tears in his eyes, the Baron informed him, that the boy had been fishing on a rock jutting into the River, and had unhappily fallen in, and was swept away by the tide. "I have been the cause of his death; if he had followed his own destiny, all would have been well."

In March, 1782, Baron Steuben introduced to Washington one of his former acquaintances, the Count de Bieniewsky.* He was cousin-german to Pulaski, and had recently arrived from France, with the intent to imitate his relative, in offering his services to Congress.

The wildest pages of romance hardly record stranger incidents, than those narrated of this celebrated adventurer. A Hungarian by birth, after becoming involved with the Emperor, and losing his estates in consequence, he entered the service of the Poles against the Russians. This was in the year 1768. After distinguishing himself in command by address and reckless bravery, in May of this year, he was dangerously wounded and taken prisoner. In company with eighty other captives, he was thrown into a subterraneous prison, and the whole party were treated with such barbarity, that, in twenty days, thirty-five of their number perished. Remaining in prison more than a year, he was finally sent, with several others, into exile in Kamschatka.

* This name was variously written by the Count himself. In his autograph letters to Washington it is written as in the text; but in other autograph letters, of a later period, it is spelled Benyowzky. In the published memoirs of his life we find it Benyowsky. A similar irregularity occurs in the name of Pulaski. The family name in Poland is Pulawski; but in America he wrote his name Pulaski.

On their arrival, Nilow, the governor, set them at liberty, and, with a trifling allowance from government, they were left to build huts in the vicinity of the town, and provide for themselves. The exiles formed themselves into a band, chose Bieniewsky for their captain, and swore eternal fidelity to each other. As the Count spoke several languages, he was finally admitted into the governor's family, to superintend the education of his three daughters. The youngest of these, Aphanasia, a beautiful girl only sixteen years of age, became ardently attached to him, and the mother finally consented to their marriage. But Bieniewsky was not in love, and, intending to use her interest only in effecting his escape, contrived to suspend the nuptials. She accidentally discovered his plot, and, fearful only of losing her lover, came in tears to entreat him not to leave her. He contrived to pacify and engage her to silence, and even to send him information, should the scheme reach the governor's ears. In a few days the signal was sent, that Nilow had taken the alarm. The Count, with his sixty associates, immediately broke into the town, dispersed the soldiers, and gained possession of the fort and a corvette then lying in the harbour. The governor was killed in the struggle.

As the Cossacs surrounded the town and threatened an attack, the associates hastily embarked in the corvette, Aphanasia accompanying them, dressed in boy's clothes. They sailed in May, 1771. After a variety of adventures in the East Indies, the Count arrived in France the following year. He induced the French ministry to attempt forming a commercial establishment on the Island of Madagascar, and to appoint him as the governor. He remained two years on the island, and acquired such influence with several tribes of the natives, that they elected him to be their king. Becoming weary of his situation, he returned to France in 1776, and in 1782, came over to this country.

Such was the person, who now, through the medium of Steuben, laid his proposals before Congress. He offered to enlist and bring from Germany a legionary corps of four thousand men, to enter the service of the United States. A stipulated sum was to be paid to the Count, to cover the expenses of enlistment and transportation, another sum to be assigned as their monthly pay, and a tract of land to be granted, on which the officers and soldiers might settle at the close of the war.

The whole plan, drawn out with great minuteness, was delivered to Washington, who approved it, after suggesting some alterations, and it was then submitted to a committee of Congress, who reported in favor of its adoption. The total expenses fell far short of what was requisite to raise and support an equal number of native soldiers. But the immediate prospect of the termination of the war rendered the expediency of so vast a project doubtful, and, on this ground, the government finally rejected the proposals. The same scheme was then laid before the Virginia legislature, and rejected by that body for the same reason.

Bieniewsky finally contracted with some merchants of Baltimore to enter into trade with the natives of Madagascar. They furnished him with a ship, in which he returned to the island, and was soon afterwards slain by a party of Frenchmen, who destroyed his fort, and broke up the establishment. His wife accompanied him to America, and was in Baltimore at the time of his death.

In March, 1783, intelligence was received that the preliminary articles of peace had been signed, and the cessation of hostilities was proclaimed to the army on the 19th of April. The attention of Congress of course was turned to the disbanding of the army, but their first measures for this purpose caused alarm and discontent among the officers and men. Large arrearages of pay were due, and all contemplated with dismay the prospect of returning penniless to their homes, after they had wasted their fortunes and their strength in the public service.

Baron Steuben sympathized fully with the distresses of others, when he had enough of private griefs to sustain. He had no home whither to retire ; he had sacrificed an independent income in Europe, and the poverty of the country, to which he had devoted his services, left him no prospect of obtaining adequate remuneration, and but a slender chance, when he was no longer needed as an officer, of securing even the means of subsistence. Yet his active benevolence constantly prompted him to share the little he possessed with others, whose necessities he deemed more pressing than his own.

On the day that the officers separated, the Baron's attention was directed to a Colonel Cochran, whose countenance showed marks of deep distress. Steuben said what he could to comfort him, but with little effect. "For myself," said Cochran, "I care not ; I can stand it. But my wife and daughters are in the garret of that wretched tavern. I know not where to carry them, nor have I the means for their removal." "Come," was the answer, "I will pay my respects to Mrs. Cochran and your daughters, if you please." Major North says, he followed the party to the loft, and that, when the Baron left the unhappy family, he left hope with them, and all that he had to give.

In deference to the Baron's feelings and active habits, Washington employed him to the last moment in the service. In July of this year, he was recommended to Congress as a fit person to proceed to Canada, and claim from General Haldimand, the commander of that province, the delivery of the posts on the frontier. The Baron was appointed to the office, and instructed to obtain, if possible, immediate possession of the fortresses; and, if not, to procure assurances, that some time should be fixed for their delivery, and due notice given, that troops might be ready to occupy them on their evacuation by the English. He was further ordered to visit the several posts as far as Quebec, and to form an opinion of such as he should deem most expedient for the United States to retain and occupy.

In conformity with these instructions, Baron Steuben left the army, and arrived at Chamblee on the 2d of August. Thence he sent forward his aid-de-camp to Quebec, to announce the object of his mission. Haldimand was about departing to the upper country, and met Steuben at Sorel on the 8th of August. He informed the Baron, that he had no orders to evacuate the posts, and did not feel authorized to enter into any negotiations whatever. He even refused a request for passports to visit the posts, on the same ground of want of orders. Steuben was therefore obliged to return without attaining any of the objects of his mission.

On the day that Washington resigned his commission as Commander-in-chief, he wrote to Steuben, making full acknowledgment of the valuable services rendered by him in the course of the war. As a proper testimonial of Steuben's merits in a military capacity, the letter is here inserted.

“Annapolis, 23 December, 1783.

“MY DEAR BARON,

“Although I have taken frequent opportunities, in public and private, of acknowledging your great zeal, attention, and abilities in performing the duties of your office; yet I wish to make use of this last moment of my public life to signify, in the strongest terms, my entire approbation of your conduct, and to express my sense of the obligations the public is under to you for your faithful and meritorious services.

“I beg you will be convinced, my dear Sir, that I should rejoice if it could ever be in my power to serve you more essentially, than by expressions of regard and affection; but, in the meantime, I am persuaded you will not be displeased with this farewell token of my sincere friendship and esteem for you.

“This is the last letter I shall write, while I continue in the service of my country. The hour of my resignation is fixed at twelve to-day; after which, I shall become a private citizen on the banks of the Potomac, where I shall be glad to embrace you, and testify the great esteem and consideration with which “I am, my dear Baron, &c.,

GEORGE WASHINGTON.”

General Lincoln having resigned his place at the head of the war department, Baron Steuben and General Knox were the prominent candidates for the office of Secretary of War. The objection to the former, and it proved a decisive one, rested on the fact, that he was a foreigner; and it was considered impolitic to trust such an important station to any other than a native citizen.

Of the personal qualifications of Baron Steuben for the desired office, there can be no reasonable doubt. In March, 1784, he submitted to Washington a plan for establishing a Continental legion, and training the militia in time of peace, which the latter returned with his entire approval.

“It was no unpleasing and flattering circumstance to me,” writes Washington in his reply, “to find such a coincidence of ideas as appears to run through your plan, and the one I had the honor to lay before a committee of Congress in May last. Mine, however, was a hasty production, the consequence of a sudden call, and little time for arrangement; yours, of maturer thought and better digestion. It therefore meets my approbation, and has my best wishes for its success."

For seven years after the close of the war, Baron Steuben was occupied in ineffectual attempts to obtain from Congress the promised recompense for his services. Some provision was required for his support in the decline of life, and he had no other resource, than this claim on the justice as well as the gratitude of his adopted country. His demand was confined to a limit approved by Washington himself; "that if a foreigner gets nothing by the service, he ought not to lose by it."

We have seen, that by the agreement with Congress in 1777, he was entitled to a repayment of the money he had advanced for the voyage, and to an equivalent for the income he had resigned in Europe. The accumulated value at simple interest, of an income of five hundred and eighty guineas a year, which he enjoyed in Germany, and loans to the amount of two thousand guineas obtained from European friends to meet the expenses of his voyage hither, and the deficiency of his pay during the war, all amounted to a large sum. The Baron stated it at ten thousand guineas, which was considerably below the calculated amount. This sum he asked of Congress as his due, but refused to take any thing as a gift, "nor would he accept of any thing but with general approbation."

Congress never expressly denied the justice of the claim, but their poverty at first induced delay, and in succeeding sessions the affair appeared stale, and was passed over with as little notice as possible. At one time they resolved to grant him seven thousand dollars in lieu of all demands. The Baron resented this proposal, considering it a virtual denial of the existence of any contract, and an impeachment of his veracity in respect to the statements he had made of his situation in Europe.

To put the former doubt at rest, he obtained the evidence of Dr. Witherspoon, the chairman of the committee with whom he conversed at Yorktown, who confirmed the statement of Baron Steuben in every particular. On the latter point, he collected a number of letters and papers, all tending to show, that he was not a needy adventurer, which some had insinuated, nor yet a pensioner of France. He submitted his statement, and the accompanying proofs, to Mr. Jay, Mr. Livingston, Colonel Hamilton, and others, all of whom declared the evidence to be satisfactory, and the demand to be fully supported. Yet Congress examined the papers and did nothing.

Nor was it till after the settlement of the Federal constitution, that the urgent recommendation of the President, and the exertions of Hamilton, procured for Steuben tardy and imperfect justice. On the 4th of June, 1790, Congress passed an act, granting to the veteran a life annuity of twenty-five hundred dollars. Individual States had already shown their sense of Baron Steuben's ill-requited services by complimentary resolutions and gifts of land. Virginia and New Jersey had each given a small tract of land, and the Assembly of New York, by a vote dated May 5th, 1786, made over to him one quarter of a township, equal to sixteen thousand acres, out of the territory recently purchased from the Oneida Indians. The site selected was in the immediate vicinity of Utica.

Upon this land Steuben caused a log house to be erected, which was designed as the home of his declining years. He had no kindred in the country, and his family consisted only of dependents and friends, whom his various acts of kindness had caused to cling to him with all the affection of children for an aged parent. He distributed nearly a tenth part of the tract to his aids and servants, and the rest of the land was let on easy terms to twenty or thirty tenants. About sixty acres were cleared in front of the house, and afforded him wheat and nourishment for a small stock of cattle.

As the surrounding country was thinly settled, a desire for society led him to pass a portion of each winter in the city of New York. Here he met his former associates, lectured his old and new friends on military tactics and discipline, and told stories of the wars. Attached to the customs of his native land, he sometimes surprised his guests by dishes dressed in the true German style. At one time, a gentleman who dined with him remembers, that there was served up a magnificent boar's head, boiled in wine, the Baron apologizing, that he had not the kind of wine appropriate to the dish.

He was never perfectly a master of the English language, though he made few mistakes in speaking, except as a matter of jest. Once, when dining with the Commander-in-chief, Mrs. Washington asked him what amusements he had, now that the business of his office was less pressing. "I read and play chess, my lady," said the Baron; "and yesterday I was invited to go a fishing. It was understood to be a very fine amusement. I sat in the boat two hours, though it was very warm, and caught two fish." "Of what kind, Baron," asked the lady. "Indeed, I do not recollect perfectly, but one of them was a whale." "A whale, Baron! in the North River!" "Yes, on my word; a very fine whale, as that gentleman informed me. Did you not tell me it was a whale, Major?" "An eel, Baron." "I beg your pardon, my lady; but the gentleman certainly called it a whale. But it is of little consequence. I shall abandon the trade, notwithstanding the fine amusement it affords."

At his house near Utica, the Baron had little society, except from the passing visit of a stranger or friend. A young man, named Mulligan, whose literary powers and destitute situation, when a boy, had attracted his notice, resided with him, and read to him in his solitary hours. His favorite aids-de-camp, Walker and North, also spent much time at his house, and their affectionate attention continued to cheer him till the close of life.

His farm and garden afforded him some amusement, but it was chiefly from a well-stored library that he derived relief from the weariness of a situation, that harmonized ill with the active duties of his former life.

Nor was he deprived of the consolations of religion. A full belief in Christianity, and frequent perusal of the Scriptures, calmed his life-worn feelings, and prepared him to meet his end with composure and humble trust.

Though the sedentary life he followed was unfavorable to his health, no failure of mind or body was apparent till November, 1794. On the 25th of that month, he retired in the evening to his chamber in his usual health, but was shortly after struck with paralysis, and partly deprived of speech. The nearest physician was called, though the case was immediately seen to be hopeless. He died on the 28th.

Agreeably to former directions, his body was wrapped in a military cloak, ornamented with the star which he had always worn, and interred in the neighboring forest. A few neighbors, his servants, and the young man, his late companion, followed his remains to the grave.

Though the place of interment was in a thick wood, a public highway was laid out some years afterwards, which passed directly over the hallowed spot. Walker caused the body to be taken up, and reinterred at a little distance, where a monument was erected and enclosed with an iron paling. He also gave an adjoining lot of land as a site for a church, on condition that the members and their successors should preserve the remains from any future violation.

Colonel North caused a tablet, with the following inscription, to be placed in the Lutheran church in Nassau Street, New York, where the Baron used to worship, when residing in the city

Baron Steuben left an only brother, who resided at Treptow, on the Baltic, in Pomerania. He wrote to Washington in September, 1796, to inquire respecting the distribution of his brother's fortune. In reply, he was informed, that, with the exception of the library and one thousand dollars, bequeathed to Mulligan, and certain small legacies, the Baron had divided his property between his two aids-de-camp. "If the fortune of Baron Steuben," added Washington, "had been as ample as his heart was benevolent, none of his friends would have been omitted in the disposition of his will."

The character of Steuben is apparent in the simple record of his life. No great discernment is required to seize its prominent traits, nor any nice touches to describe its plain and manly features. Educated in the school of war, the best in Europe before the time of Napoleon, approved and trusted by the great Frederic, his services to his adopted country were invaluable. By imparting discipline, he gave confidence to the officers and men, and enabled the troops from different parts of the country to act together with unanimity and effect. By introducing military habits of strict obedience, he suppressed tumult and disorder; and, by his rigid system of inspection, great sums were saved at a time when the very existence of the nation depended on economy in the army. Circumstances unfitted him for a separate command. Though able, perhaps, to lead regular troops, he could not successfully direct the operations of militia. Bred under a monarch, whose slightest word was law, and accustomed to the complete subordination of the civil to the military rule, he was frequently brought into unpleasant collision with the people and the State authorities. Washington at once discerned his proper station, and, by placing him at the head of the department of inspection, secured to the army the utmost benefit from his peculiar abilities.

Warm-hearted, affectionate, generous to the extreme, the soldiers loved him, and many officers regarded him with romantic attachment. Meanness he could not comprehend, and want of fidelity to engagements he abhorred. His warmth of temper sometimes involved him in difficulties; but, as he could not retain anger himself, others were unable to be permanently offended with him. He was prompt to acknowledge a mistake, and eager to make reparation wherever it was due. In his manners he was formal, and he had high notions of the respect due to military rank; but the friends, whom his active benevolence had secured, were never estranged even by apparent coldness of demeanor. His disinterested services, imperfectly requited in his lifetime, should be the longer remembered by the people, to the establishment of whose liberties they were devoted.

SEBASTIAN CABOT; BY CHARLES HAYWARD, JR.

PREFACE

It has been necessary to gather materials for the following sketch chiefly from old and imperfect histories. So many interesting personal and public records of Sebastian Cabot have perished, that it is difficult to write a connected narrative of the events of his life, or to exhibit, in their proper light, the strong and remarkable traits of his character. It is somewhat discouraging, also, to find so few private anecdotes, and so little account of his domestic habits, which, after all, bring the man most vividly before us. Of his youth we know absolutely nothing; and it is necessary to delineate his character, without a knowledge of the minute influences under which it was formed. These obstacles, however, great as they are, should not prevent us from doing what justice we can to a man, who holds so high a place in the early history of America, and whose unobtrusive greatness has been studiously overlooked; and it is believed enough has been collected to interest the reader in his fortune, and to lead him to respect his character, honor his fame, and appreciate his hitherto neglected exertions.

I feel bound, distinctly and gratefully, to acknowledge my obligations to a volume, entitled "A Memoir of Sebastian Cabot"; a work of uncommon ability and learning, and of indefatigable research, without which the numerous and extraordinary errors of the old authors would probably have been perpetuated. This work, first published in London in the year 1831, was written by Mr. Richard Biddle, of Pennsylvania

SEBASTIAN CABOT.

CHAPTER I.

Cabot's Birth and Youth. — Henry the Seventh grants a Patent for the Discovery of a Northwest Passage. — Discovery of the American Continent. — Cabot penetrates Hudson's Bay. — Failure of Provisions and Objections of his Crew. — Returns to England. — Second Patent. — Death of John Cabot. — Second Voyage to America. — Attempts to colonize Labrador. — Fails to discover a Northwest Passage. — Dissatisfaction of Colonists. — His Return to England. — Injustice of Henry the Seventh. — Cabot quits his Service.

It has been the lot of the individual, whose adventures form the subject of the following narrative, to receive little gratitude for important services. Many know little more of him, than that he was a voyager of olden times. Of his peculiar fitness, enterprise, and perseverance, while multitudes have heralded the praises of less worthy men, very few have chosen to speak. England herself was not profuse of her favors to him while living, nor until lately has she seemed disposed to render justice to his memory. The inquirer is surprised to see how scanty are the written testimonials to his official excellence and private modesty and worth.

SEBASTIAN CABOT was born at Bristol, in England, about the year 1477,* and was the son of John Cabot, the eminent Venetian navigator. From his father's occasional residence abroad, has probably arisen the idea that Sebastian Cabot was an Italian; an error which has crept into several biographical compilations, but which his own testimony explicitly refutes. "Sebastian Cabote tould me," says Richard Eden, "that he was borne in Bristowe, and that at four yeare ould he was carried with his father to Venice, and so returned agayne into England with his father, after certain years, whereby he was thought to have been borne in Venice."† Of Cabot's early years a meagre account has been transmitted. After his removal to Venice, at four years of age, he probably received from his father, who is described as a man of considerable ability in mathematics and other sciences, a thorough and judicious education; and, besides being instructed with his two brothers in arithmetic, geography, and cosmography, he acquired while young, much skill in practical navigation.

We do not exactly know the year of his return to England. It was, however, while he was yet a boy; for we find him there entering with youthful enthusiasm into the theories and golden speculations, which the discoveries of Columbus excited throughout Europe. He was just arrived at manhood, when that intrepid navigator imparted new life to the old world by his voyages to the western hemisphere. All Europe was awakened, and the family of the Cabots was among the warmest in insisting on further maritime adventure. There was a romance in the idea of discovering unknown realms; the world was to be enlarged; every kingdom of nature was to be more productive. Fancy wove around the success of Columbus numerous attractions for the inexperienced and adventurous, and an enthusiasm, of which we can hardly conceive, pervaded all classes. Cabot, after alluding to the feelings of his countrymen, adds, "By this fame and report, there increased in my heart a great flame of desire to attempt some notable thing." No wonder that the future adventurer, ambitious, intelligent, scarcely arrived at manhood, and educated by an experienced navigator, should be enthusiastic in the cause. Before long the young seaman saw his wishes gratified.

King Henry the Seventh, having failed to secure the services of Columbus, granted a patent, under date of March 5th, 1496, to John Cabot and his three sons, Lewis, Sebastian, and Sancius authorizing them, their heirs or deputies, "to sail to all parts, countries, and seas of the East, of the West, and of the North, under our banners and ensigns, with five ships, of what burden or quantity soever they may be, and as many mariners or men as they will have with them in the said ships, upon their own proper costs and charges, to seek out, discover, and find whatsoever isles, countries, regions, or provinces of the heathen and infidels, whatsoever they may be, and in what part of the world soever they be, which before this time have been unknown to all Christians."* In accordance with this patent, immediate preparations were made to discover the Northwest passage to India; the first important enterprise in which Sebastian took part.

It has been a much controverted question, whether John Cabot was not himself the principal in, and consequently entitled to the credit of, this expedition. For many years it was supposed that he was; although some writers warmly contended, and one has lately proved,* that the voyage was chiefly forwarded by his son Sebastian. The problem is not a difficult one. Henry the Seventh was notoriously thrifty; he had granted a liberal patent, and he naturally secured his stipulated share, namely, one fifth of the profits, by imposing liabilities on the wealthy Venetian merchant. Sebastian was little more than seventeen years of age, and the King chose that the patent should be dignified by the name of an elder man. Moreover the father "followed the trade of marchandise," and would gladly facilitate by a short cut, as was their expectation, the commerce of the East.

* Hakluyt's Voyages and Discoveries, Vol. III. p. 6.

The resources of John Cabot, the royal donations, and the pride and ambition of all parties, assisted the project, until, in the spring of 1497, every obstacle having been removed, the expedition sailed from Bristol under the guidance of its youthful commander. The father accompanied his son, but only, it is probable, to give occasional advice, and to superintend the mercantile proceedings. Even at the early date of this voyage, a trade was established between Iceland and Bristol; not only, therefore, for the sake of trade, but to recruit the spirit of the crews, which an untried and hazardous voyage might otherwise depress, they laid their course toward Iceland. Minute accounts of this enterprise are not in existence; but sufficient remains to show the firmness and intelligence, which marked then and afterwards the character of Cabot.

After a considerable delay at Iceland, the party, partaking in some degree of their young leader's enthusiasm, began their voyage through the western seas. "They sailed happily," we are told, "confident of finding the long-desired Northwest passage to India, till the 24th of June, 1497," when an unexpected wonder was revealed.* About five o'clock in the morning, the observers from the leading ships were surprised at the discovery of land, which, on a nearer approach, was found considerably extended. Cabot's simple account of this momentous discovery is amusing. He hoped to make his way immediately to India, "but, after certayne dayes," said he, "I found that the land ranne towards the north, which was to mee a great displeasure." However great a displeasure to the young navigator, he had discovered the American continent. The land seen was the coast, together with an island off the coast, of Labrador; the latter received the name of St. John's Island, from the day on which it was discovered, and is described as "full of white bears, and stagges far greater than the English.”* Columbus had discovered and taken possession of islands in the New World, but it was reserved for Cabot to obtain the first sight of the continent. We here perceive the straight-forward energy of the young navigator; he did not forget, as many would have done, the object of his voyage. Although his men were attracted by the unexpected continent, he remembered his obligation to open the India passage, and, there is reason to think, penetrated farther north than to the sixty-seventh degree, in the accomplishment, as he hoped, of his design.

The bay, since called Hudson's Bay, appeared to Cabot to be the passage he was seeking. With something like triumph he left his course on the ocean; the extensive sheet of water before him confirmed his opinion, and for several days he went forward confident of success. As he was urging on with no less enthusiasm than when he left Bristol, discontent was manifested on the part of his crew. He reasoned with them, encouraged, and commanded; but they wanted his youthful confidence; their voyage had been long and dangerous; their provisions were nearly exhausted; they were going they knew not whither; and they insisted on returning to England. He had sufficient self-command and policy not to contend with these repining mariners; he mildly promised to comply with their demands. Retracing his steps with philosophical coolness, and relinquishing his project, he soon regained the Atlantic. After coasting to the southward, he left the continent he had discovered, and returned to his native country.

If Sebastian Cabot had been a vain man, he might have boasted, on his return, of what he had succeeded in accomplishing. Such, however, does not seem to have been his character, and we find him making immediate exertions for a second expedition. His arguments in favor of the first voyage had been laughed at; he was accused of being visionary; when age should teach him wisdom, the cautious said, he would be content to stay at home. His fortunes now wore a different aspect; in his search for the India passage, he had set eyes on the New World; his plans, after all, were not quite so visionary, and the most incredulous allowed that one so enterprising and fortunate should make another attempt.

A second patent, bearing date February '3d, 1498, was granted by Henry the Seventh. It stood in the name of John Cabot and his deputies, Sebastian being still a young man, and it allowed them "six English shippes, so that and if the said shippes be of the bourdeyn of two hundred tonnes or under, with their apparail requisite and necessarie for the safe conduct of the said shippes." * They were further instructed to pursue their original discoveries. These second letters show less of the thrifty spirit which Henry before displayed. The result of the former voyage had warmed the King into something like liberality.

Shortly after the date of this patent, John Cabot died, and Sebastian determined to prosecute alone the voyage, of which he had ever, in reality, the direction. Aside from his adventurous spirit, the heavy expenses of the first voyage had been requited only by his claims in the new country. Neither was he ready to relinquish what he had so hardly won, now that public favor was on his side. What the royal interest was in this second expedition, it is impossible to state; it extended, however, to one or two ships, and a considerable amount of funds. "Divers merchants of London also adventured small stocks," induced, as mankind are in every age and country, by the novelty of the project. Trusting that the India passage would still be ascertained, or that the new country might be a profitable market, mercantile adventurers exerted themselves to freight several small vessels, which, as part of Cabot's fleet, sailed from Bristol in 1498.

* This interesting document has lately been discovered by the indefatigable author of the "Memoir of Sebastian Cabot," by whom it was first given to the world

But for the grossest neglect, we might have learned the particulars of these memorable voyages from Cabot himself. A series of his papers, with suitable maps, descriptive of these adventures, was left nearly ready for publication. Carelessness, however, suffered them to be mislaid, and now time has hidden them for ever. How delightful as well as remarkable was the modesty, which made no boast of such achievements; committing merit to the keeping of a few hasty manuscripts, and the gratitude of posterity; that gratitude, which has suffered such a man to be forgotten, because he forbore to proclaim his own praises.

The particulars of Cabot's second expedition to the American continent are very scanty. His patience and daring do not seem to have met with success. Besides searching for the desirable route to the East, his object was doubtless to colonize the new region, for which purpose he took with him three hundred men. Before long he once more saw with delight the shores of the New World. With characteristic promptitude he effected a landing on the coast of Labrador, and instructed a portion of his men to examine the country, with a view to colonization, while he sailed farther to seek the passage. His course is uncertain, and not very important, since his intentions were defeated.

During Cabot's absence, his crew upon the land found it is supposed, with extreme cold, although in the middle of July. "The dayes were very longe, and in manner without nyght." The territory was a wilderness, and provisions were unattainable; in a word, they missed their usual English comforts, and gave way to despondency. Several excursions for exploring the country were attempted; but the resolution, which the conduct and commands of their young leader had inspired, was gone, and they were naturally enough dispirited by the loss of companions and friends, who daily perished under the severity of the climate. Cabot, not finding what he sought, returned to Labrador; but how was the vexation of his other disappointments increased on learning the condition of his colonists! Not only had they taken no steps toward a settlement, but absolutely refused to remain longer on the coast. They complained of exposure to a cold climate, and, with a disregard to previous engagements and all manly discipline, insisted on being removed.

Cabot yielded to the demands of his crew, and having laid his course to the south as far as Cape Florida, he recrossed the Atlantic. His reception in England was calculated to hurt his pride, and it accounts for the blank at this period in his public life. Let us see how his nation repaid the discoverer of the American continent.*

* I am aware, that at so late a day it seems presumptuous to deny that Columbus was the discoverer of Amer

Henry the Seventh was one of the most penurious monarchs ever seated on the throne of England; avarice was with him almost a disease, and so far from excelling, he fell far short of many of his subjects in liberality. Such was the king, who, it will be remembered, was considerably interested in Cabot's pecuniary success. When the navigator returned without having opened the new way to the luxuries of India, or having colonized the lately discovered territory, disappointment was manifested both by the King and private individuals. And, as the Cornish rebellion was demanding the royal attention, and the novelty of the voyages had worn away, Cabot met with coldness and neglect. The King's method of revenging a miscarriage, which no one could have prevented, convinces us that his disease, as has been said, "had now reached his moral sense."

The second letters patent empowered John Cabot and his deputies, with no mention of heirs;

ica; certainly, presumptuous, despite the theories concerning the Northmen and others, to assert that Cabot first discovered it. That he is entitled to priority of claim to Columbus, in discovering the continent, will appear from a comparison of dates. Cabot's discovery was made June 24th, 1497. Columbus discovered the continent on his third voyage, which commenced May 30th, 1498; and Amerigo Vespucci did not leave Spain until May 20th, 1499. Cabot was, therefore, nearly one year in advance of Columbus, and nearly two in advance of Amerigo Vespucci.

so that in strictness the privilege expired at his death, and Sebastian, in acting under this grant, might possibly have violated his powers. Of this quibble, the magnanimous monarch availed himself to rescind the privileges of the first patent, in which his name actually appeared.

Cabot felt deeply the royal injustice, and although his means were limited, he had no idea of depending on a disappointed and mean-spirited sovereign. If Henry, like Ferdinand of Spain in his treatment of Columbus, could slight a man to whom the world was indebted, the poor mariner could rid himself of a monarch whose patronage was limited by hope of pecuniary compensation. In the year 1499, he again asked royal assistance; but, meeting with "noe greate or favourable entertainment," he furnished out of his own means the suitable vessels, and, setting forth from Bristol, "made great discoveries."

For fifteen years he scarcely returned to England; at least, he took no part in any of her naval expeditions. We hear of him at one period at Maracaibo. That his spirit of adventure could be suddenly checked, is not probable; and perhaps, besides extending his reputation abroad, he was perfecting his naval education. Columbus had now made his second and third voyages, and had thereby gained the fame of having discovered America. Other adventurers, too, who but fol lowed the steps of predecessors, were honored as public benefactors, while not one "bay, cape, or headland" in the new country recalled by its name the memory of Cabot. With these reflections were nearly fifteen years of his life embittered. He no more proffered his services to a monarch who had slighted them, and in the year 1512, we find him in the employ of the Spanish government.

CHAPTER II.

Henry the Eighth. — Ferdinand of Spain invites Cabot to his Service. — Cabot stationed at Seville. — Council of the Indies. — Death of Ferdinand. — Cabot returns to England. — Expedition of 1517. — Sir Thomas Pert the Cause of its Failure. — Cabot recalled to Spain by Charles the Fifth. — Appointed Pilot-Major of Spain. — Expedition to the Moluccas. — Council of Badajos. — Jealousy of the Portuguese. — Diego Garcia. — Martin Mendez. — The Brothers Rojas.

THE loss of the documents before alluded to cannot be too much lamented. Without them, it must be confessed, the fifteen years previous to Cabot's appearance in Spain are poorly accounted for. A blank occurs, which these annals, written when his spirits were buoyant, and his mind active, would doubtless fill up.*

* That such papers were once accessible, may be inferred from the following passage in Hakluyt, which stands as the heading to Cabot's description of St. John's island, — "An extract taken out of the map of Sebastian Cabot, cut by Clement Adams, concerning his discovery of the West Indies, which is to be seene in her Majestie's privie gallerie at Westminster, and in many other ancient merchants' houses."

King Henry the Seventh died in the year 1509, during Cabot's absence; and upon the accession of his son it became probable that the covetousness of the father would be in some measure atoned for, and that Cabot would be reinstated in the naval service. Henry the Eighth, only eighteen years of age when he ascended the throne, had an "active and fiery spirit," which had been hitherto directed toward the attainment of a superior education. His opinion of his own talents, and his ambition, were considerable, and he made free with the hoarded treasure of his father in encouraging projects of public utility. Such a monarch, particularly as the events of the last ten years had raised Cabot's original discoveries in the general estimation, was likely to retrieve the errors of his predecessor.

In this state of affairs, Ferdinand of Spain determined to anticipate the movements of Henry, by attaching Cabot to his service. Amerigo Vespucci having lately died, an opening in the naval department seemed to offer itself. Accordingly, while Henry was engaged in continental discussions, Ferdinand addressed a letter to Lord Willoughby, Captain-general of England, requesting him to forward his designs by sending Cabot to Spain; a direction which was complied with on the 13th of September, 1512. The king of Spain, with a very sudden desire to be considered a patron of science, made great exertions to extend maritime discoveries. On Cabot's arrival in his kingdom, he gave him the title of his Captain, and stationed him at Seville with a liberal allowance, and at first, as it would appear, with no definite duties. Ferdinand seems to have wished to atone for his treatment in England, and to have been aware that no one could afford more valuable information concerning the Northwest passage, and the coast of Labrador.

In 1515, Cabot was employed, with several of the best cosmographers of the age, on Ferdinand's favorite project, a general revision of maps and charts. During the same year he was honored by being chosen a member of the Council of the Indies, a fact which, considering his age and nativity, shows him to have been in high favor at court. These duties were probably well performed, since, when Ferdinand set on foot an expedition to sail the following year in search of the India passage, he complimented Cabot so highly as to give him the command. This advancement is doubtless as much attributable to Ferdinand's rivalry with Henry, as to the talents of the navigator. An ambitious king easily overlooks the faults of a favorite. We come now to one of the sudden changes, which it was Sebastian Cabot's fortune often to experience.

The new expedition was in considerable for wardness, when, unluckily for him, Ferdinand died on the 23d of January, 1516. All preparations were checked, public well-wishers and ambitious speculators were disappointed, but Cabot had more cause than any other to regret the loss of his patron. Charles the Fifth, who was to be the successor, had lately been acknowledged Emperor in the Netherlands, and remained some time in Brussels before assuming the Spanish crown; a period of dissension and much confusion among the Spaniards, who, by means of his minister Chièvres, employed every intriguing art to find favor with the young sovereign.

Ferdinand's kindness to Cabot had incensed his jealous subjects; they were indignant, that the King should have raised a foreigner to his confidence, and availed themselves of his death to manifest their resentment. They insinuated that the voyage of 1496 had accomplished nothing, that Cabot was a foreign impostor, and that under their new king affairs should take a different turn. Cardinal Ximenes was too aged to govern with severity during the interregnum, and when Charles arrived in Spain, at only sixteen years of age, intriguers and misrepresenters had given an undue bias to his mind. Even Fonseca, the notorious calumniator of Columbus, was in office.

Cabot could catch no glimmer of hope in all this darkness; and, that he might avoid undeserved obloquy, he returned once more to England. We may remark here his determination, constantly adhered to, of being independent of royalty. If he perceived that he was not needed, he left his king's employment; otherwise, he considered his services an equivalent for the favors received. His strong common sense, which generally exceeded his intellectual powers, prevented his considering a well-founded enterprise desperate because of a few untoward accidents; and he relied on his own honest intentions in withstanding envy or malice.

After a short residence in England, our navigator succeeded in fitting out the expedition which the death of Ferdinand had delayed. Henry the Eighth, probably not displeased at his return, "furnished certen shippes" and some funds, and appointed one Sir Thomas Pert first in command under Cabot, whose weakness, as we shall see, rendered the affair a failure. They sailed from England in 1517. Concerning their exact destination many disputes have arisen. Several historians say, that they went on a trading voyage to the Spanish settlements in the West Indies; but these accounts are so confused, that we find them at one time off the coast of Labrador, and shortly after as far south as Cape Florida. The point is interesting, because, if Cabot really undertook a trading voyage, he must have relinquished, in a moment of pique, his hopes of discovering the Northwest passage. But the fact is otherwise. The trading voyage, which, by a confusion of dates, is assigned to 1517, actually took place ten years after, in 1527. So that Cabot was neither so inconsistent, nor so ungrateful to the memory of his late patron, as to interfere with a trade to which the Spanish government laid an exclusive claim.

Contemporary and subsequent accounts represent Sir Thomas Pert as totally unfit to be second in command in such an expedition. His cowardice was sufficient to render his commander's energy ineffectual. They penetrated to about the sixty-seventh degree of north latitude, and, entering Hudson's Bay, gave English names to various places in the vicinity, when, as previously, doubts of success arose among the crew. The severity of the climate, and many privations, increased their eagerness to return; while Pert, a man of high command and influence, favored their remonstrances. Under such circumstances it was impossible to quell the mutiny by force; and, the pilots being unable to convince the understandings of the crew, Cabot turned homeward. Although he had confessedly failed, he must have gained credit in England by his resolution, while Sir Thomas seems to have been recognised as the cause of the miscarriage. "His faint heart," says Eden,

“was the cause that the voyage took none effect.”*

Neither the merchants interested in the late unfortunate expedition, nor the King, who was now engaged on the continent, were disposed to renew an attempt to discover the long-desired passage. Moreover, a frightful disease, † known as the Sweating Sickness, prevailed in England in 1517, and prevented the nation from thinking of an expensive and unpromising enterprise. Fortunately for Cabot, the affairs of Spain were in a better condition. Soon after his accession, Charles the Fifth, examining into the unsettled expedition of 1516, was surprised at the sudden disappearance of Cabot. He already knew something of his character, and the state records bore ample testimony of Ferdinand’s high regard for him. These facts sufficiently exposed the jealousy and intrigues of the Spaniards; and Charles, anxious to atone for past injustice, appointed Cabot, in 1518, to the honorable office of Pilot-Major of

* It has been a question whether this was not the first entrance into Hudson’s Bay, and whether the latitude of sixty-seven was reached in 1497. As these questions have little interest for the general reader, I omit any further discussion of them. They are treated at length in the “Memoir of Cabot,” Chapter xiv.

Spain.* This favor was confirmed when the Emperor visited England, in 1520.

Cabot's duties now became numerous and highly responsible. Public opinion inclined to a Southern expedition. "What need have we," said Peter Martyr, the historian, "of these things, which are common with all the people of Europe? To the South! to the South! They that seek for riches must not go to the cold and frozen North."

Attention was gradually directed to the Moluccas, and the other islands in the same latitude; and Cabot advised a voyage thither through the Straits of Magellan, then recently discovered. But, before the project was matured, he was brought conspicuously before the public. Portugal, having hitherto by the old route engrossed the trade of the Moluccas, remonstrated strongly against these movements in Spain, and contended, that, by the grants of the papal bull, the said islands fell within her limits. Spain laid an opposing claim; and, in order to a settlement, the Emperor ordained, that a solemn council should be held at Badajos in the year 1524. At the head of a list of persons summoned for consultation, and of course of the highest repute in the nautical profession, is the name of Cabot. After more than a month's session, the council declared, on the 31st of May, that the islands fell, by at least twenty degrees, within the Spanish limits. The Portuguese representatives retired, much chagrined, and uttered blind threats of maintaining their pretensions by force. We shall hereafter see how they vented their dissatisfaction.

The important decision being made known, a Company was formed for the prosecution of the Molucca trade, of which, having received permission from the Council of the Indies, Cabot accepted the command. He gave bonds for the faithful performance of his duty, and by the articles of agreement, executed at Madrid in 1525, three ships and one hundred and fifty men were to be provided by the Emperor, and the Company were to supply all funds for commercial purposes. Four thousand ducats, and a share of the profits, were guarantied to the Emperor. In this enterprise Cabot received the title of Captain-general, and the month of August, 1525, was fixed upon for their departure. Numerous circumstances, however, were combined to cause delay.

When the Portuguese found their threats had no effect on Charles the Fifth, they resorted to more courteous remonstrances. Their young king insisted, that an invasion of his monopoly would be the ruin of his kingdom, from which the consanguinity of the parties, as well as their connexion by marriage (he having obtained the hand of the Emperor's sister), should secure him. To this Charles replied, that, however much he might regard domestic ties, he could not reasonably be expected to relinquish an enterprise, the right to which lay entirely on his side. Incensed by this refusal, the king of Portugal took secret measures to thwart his rival's hopes; employing, as the sequel renders probable, a worthless man, named Diego Garcia. This person, who could probably be induced by pay to any villany, prepared with great secrecy a squadron of three vessels, solely, we must believe, to embarrass Cabot's movements. We shall meet him at a more advanced stage of the enterprise.

Meantime many delays occurred at home to try the patience of our navigator. One set of men harassed him exceedingly by superintending, in the capacity of agents, the naval arrangements. In almost every point they were at variance. He wished to appoint his own lieutenant-general, and nominated one De Rufis, a trust-worthy friend, to that office. The deputies pretended to be provoked at his obstinacy, and committed the trust to one Martin Mendez, late an officer under Magellan. Whether Cabot was unjustly prejudiced against this man, which is quite possible, or not, it is evident that no unanimity could exist between such officers ; nor would Cabot consent to the appointment, until a written promise had been given, that Mendéz should act only under his directions or in his absence. Instead of looking, therefore, for counsel and friendship in the lieutenant, the captain could only hope that he would not openly oppose his orders.

Two brothers, of Spanish extraction, named Miguel de Rojas and Francisco de Rojas, who afterwards made themselves conspicuous, were also attached to the expedition. The former was a man of considerable valor and nautical skill, the latter the commander of one of the ships, the Trinidad, and both of them zealous adherents of Martin Mendez.

Finally, to complete this dangerous outfit, the unprecedented step was taken of furnishing each ship with sealed orders, which were to be opened as soon as they were fairly embarked. These, which were probably given without Cabot's knowledge, contained the provision, that, in case of his death, the chief command should devolve on one of eleven persons therein nominated, and, in case of their death, on him chosen by the general vote, provided that, on an equality of votes, the candidates should cast lots. This was indeed a most ingenious "premium to disaffection," and, if these facts were known to him, Cabot was to blame for sailing at such odds. Perhaps, however, as he had haggled so long with the captious deputies, he was unwilling to raise new objections.

Under these inauspicious circumstances the expedition sailed at length in the beginning of April 1526. A temptation, as we have seen, was before every individual to strive after the supreme power. That its devolving on some of the inferiors was thought possible in Spain, the sealed orders plainly showed ; and we cannot mark the commencement of such a voyage without more than one misgiving as to its success ; without a fear lest the commander's energy may fail, in time of need, to calm those stormy elements of disaffection and treachery.

CHAPTER III.

Cabot sails to the Canaries, and thence to the Cape de Verds. — Disaffection of Mendez and the Rojas. — Mutiny. — Cabot enters the River La Plata. — Annoyed by the Natives. — Enters the Paraná and the Paraguay. — Three Spaniards seized, and a violent Contest ensues. — The Party harassed by Diego Garcia, who overtakes Cabot at Santa Aña, and claims the Right of Discovery. — Cabot resists. — Garcia leaves the Country. — Cabot sends a Messenger to Spain, and determines to conquer Peru. — The Emperor's pecuniary Embarrassments, when he receives the Report. — Cabot explores the La Plata. — Quarrel between the Followers of Cabot and Garcia. — Capture of Sanctus Spiritus. — The Adventurers return to Spain.

No one would have been surprised, had the smothered flame of mutiny, which every arrangement must have tended to cherish, broken out the very day of leaving the shore. That event was reserved for a later period. The testimony of personal friends, as well as his public life, gives us a high idea of Cabot's gentleness of character. His companions always speak of him with affection, and few instances of his harshness or severity are recorded. Of firmness, in time of danger, we shall see he was not destitute. His ambition was indulged for the public good. Had he been more mindful of himself, he would have escaped many disappointments, and enjoyed more renown.

He first sailed to the Canaries,* and thence to the Cape de Verd Islands, touching at both, it is probable, to replenish the stock of provisions, and committing no such outrages as his enemies have represented. The Islanders were uniformly kind to him, and injury in return would have been unnecessary and impolitic. Cape St. Augustine was their next stopping-place, from which they laid their course to the south. But the voyage was not thus far accomplished without trouble; for the three secret traitors were much confirmed by the extraordinary arrangements of the deputies to provide for the Captain-general's losing the command.

Cunning men in power may always find causes of dissatisfaction; and Martin Mendez and the brothers Rojas soon began to complain, that Cabot did not strive to allay the disputes which had arisen at Seville. They tried to convince the sailors, that he had laid in no adequate store of provisions, or, at any rate, that he secreted them in his own vessel from general distribution. Mendez desired his partisans, if they were true men, to withstand oppression, and depose a tyrant in favor of honest officers. The plans of revolt were originated and matured by these reckless mariners in utter secrecy. At length the time came, which was agreed on for active resistance.

As the squadron was running down the coast of Brazil, these men became openly insolent in blaming the movements of their commander, exhorting the crews, who naturally partook of the excitement, to avail themselves promptly of the privileges of the sealed orders. Cabot's situation was a critical one; but two of his countrymen were in the expedition, and he heard all around him insinuations of foreign usurpation, and that he was raised by favor to govern a people whom he had never materially served. As his three highest officers were inimical, he saw that he must rely solely on himself. The band which rallied around Mendez, he was well aware, hoped to intimidate him by numbers, and were not prepared for decisive resistance; accordingly, without the scruples of a weaker man, and with no attempt at a compromise, he ordered Martin Mendez and Miguel and Francisco de Rojas to be seized, (taking the latter from his ship without ceremony,) and, placing them with two faithful seamen in an open boat, he put them on shore at the nearest island. Th degrading treatment of men so lately glorying in their superiority was never forgotten; and years afterward we find them employing their malice against their energetic commander.

The measure was entirely successful in quelling further mutiny. But as the Captain-general had lost his highest officers, he felt unauthorized, without special permission, to prosecute the original enterprise, and, as the best expedient, directed his course to the mouth of the La Plata. It is probable, that he intended to make this river merely a temporary stopping-place. It proved, however, the scene of much wild adventure. In fact, we have now reached the most romantic period in Cabot's life. In addition to being deprived of his officers, he lost one of his vessels by shipwreck, which deterred him altogether from prosecuting the voyage. He resolved, with his usual activity of mind, to renew the attempt to explore the La Plata; in making which, his predecessor in the office of Pilot-Major, Diego de Solis, had perished. This course, under existing circumstances, was probably the best; certainly he was right in waiting further commands from the Emperor. The next five years did much to unfold his character, prove his skill, and mature his judgment. His predecessor, it must be remembered, with a body of fifty men, had been inhumanly butchered, and actually devoured by the people among whom he was thrown.

Cabot sailed boldly up the river, from which modern navigating skill has not yet removed the dangers, as far as the small island afterwards called St. Gabriel, just off the city of Buenos Ayres. Near this is the island called after Martin Garcia, pilot of the unfortunate Solis, and one of the few who escaped the voracity of the savages. He afterwards died and was buried in the place where Diego was destroyed.

But this melancholy spot was not necessary to remind our adventurer of the hostility of the natives; for their very first landing at St. Gabriel was stoutly resisted. His courage, however, prevailed; and, obtaining a suitable ground for anchoring his vessels, the captain with most of his crew proceeded to further discovery in boats. Seven leagues farther up, he found the port which he named St. Salvador,* situated on an island just where the La Plata changes into the Paraná, and nearly opposite the mouth of the Uruguay. Here the inhabitants likewise annoyed the Spaniards by killing two of their number; declaring, however, that to make a meal of them was not their intention, since the party of Solis had given them sufficient opportunity to taste the flesh of soldiers.

St. Salvador proved an excellent harbor, and the ships were left there with a guard under Antonio de Grajeda. Meantime Cabot prepared several boats and a small caravel, and proceeded up the Paraná. Some miles higher up, he erected the fort still seen on the maps as Sanctus Spiritus, finding the inhabitants for the first time very intelligent, and, according to Herrera, "a good, rational people." Although our voyager's party, at first not numerous, was greatly diminished by defection and mortality, his hopes do not seem to have been weakened for a moment. He encouraged the avaricious by hopes of gain, and pointed out to the weary the wonderful novelties of the country through which they were passing. Besides, the natives were daily attracted from the shore, and, in the simplicity of their admiration, flocked to the ships.

After sailing through a land "very fayre and inhabited with infinite people," they reached the point where the river receives the Paraguay, itself branching off to the right. Leaving the Paraná, therefore, on the right, they ascended the new river about thirty-four leagues.* The inhabitants of this district differed from any before seen, being acquainted with agriculture, and carrying to a great extent their jealousy of foreign invasion, and particularly their hatred toward the Spanish and Portuguese. These qualities contrasted singularly with some other points in their character; they were industrious, regardful of each other's rights, and cultivated their land to advantage; while their continual enmity to strangers rendered our navigator's situation extremely critical. Notwithstanding his care to avert difficulty, his hitherto peaceful voyage was soon changed into fierce contention.

Three Spaniards having one day unwittingly left their party, to gather the fruit of the palm tree, the natives laid violent hands on them. Resistance was impossible, and the poor fellows were easily captured. Their comrades, on learning the news, determined to avenge the wrong; and Cabot, for the first time, became a military commander.

The small band of Spanish adventurers, worn by the labors of a long voyage, might well have declined a contest with the hordes of natives that now came against them. But their national spirit, together with the hardihood of their profession, made them alive to every injury. They were ignorant of the country, and unskilled in their enemy's mode of warfare; but yet, under Cabot's command, they sustained their part of a long and bloody contest with unflinching courage. It probably lasted most of the day, doubly severe for our adventurers, inasmuch as they had no strong-holds on the shore; yet, on its conclusion, three hundred natives and only twenty-five Spaniards were found to have fallen. The Captain-general, we may suppose from this fact, showed a fair degree of military skill; he was enabled to retain his position in the river, and, after the battle, despatched a letter to the commander of one of the forts, giving the particulars of the affray, and the loss on each side.

Cabot could ill afford to lose these men, particularly as their fate depressed the hopes of the survivors, who had by no means agreed to undergo the hardships of a voyage up the La Plata. From this time, the prospects of the party, hitherto bright, became dark and ominous. Cabot doubtless might have withstood any further attacks during his voyage, had not Diego Garcia, a man whom we have met before, and who seems always to have been the evil genius of our navigator, interrupted his plans at this point. It is time to trace this man's movements after leaving Spain under the auspices of the Portuguese government.

The reasons for believing that the king of Portugal, disappointed by the decision of the council at Badajos, employed Garcia to follow Cabot's steps, and frustrate his projects, have already been stated. Let us see how faithfully the mission was performed. Garcia left Spain in 1526, made his way to the Canaries, next to the Cape de Verds, and thence to the coast of Brazil. During the early months of 1527, he visited the bay of All Saints, the island of Patos, and at length, probably baulked of his intention of meeting Cabot at either of the abovementioned places, he entered the mouth of the La Plata. His course thus far, it will be seen, was exactly that of Cabot, and he ascended the river immediately.

Antonio de Grajeda, commander of the ships which Cabot left at St. Salvador, had just received the letter announcing the dreadful battle, when he perceived Garcia's party coming up the La Plata. Agitated by the late news, he fancied that they were no others than the mutineers, whom the captain had put on shore; accordingly Garcia was met with several armed boats, led by the commander in person. At first he favored the misconception, and they had nearly come to open contest; he declared himself, however, in time to secure a peaceable issue. Parting with one of his vessels, which he had shamefully allowed to be employed in the slave business, he ordered the remainder to follow him immediately to the commodious harbor of St. Salvador. Perhaps he foresaw that Cabot would give him no favorable reception, and was willing to have forces at hand.

Garcia then manned two brigantines with sixty men, and ascended thence to the fort of Sanctus Spiritus, where Cabot had left a small force under Gregorio Caro. This commander was courteous and good-natured; and to Garcia's haughty demand of a surrender of the fort, he replied, that, although very ready to serve his guest, he should hold command in the name of Cabot and the Emperor. He seems, however, to have kept terms with the Portuguese. Indeed, we can hardly suppose that he was aware of Garcia's character and intentions; for he requested, as a favor, that he would liberate any of Cabot's party that might have fallen into the enemy's hands, pledging himself to reimburse whatever ransom money was expended; and finally besought him to befriend the Spaniards, should they in the late skirmish have lost their commander.

This is not the language he would have used towards Garcia, had he fully known him; and it was only likely to excite a smile in an unprincipled man, in the employ of a revengeful government. Indeed, when he reached the Paraguay, Diego was so mindful of Caro's requests, that he made an excursion along the right branch of the Paraná. This movement is the only one which seems to contradict the supposition, that he intended from the first to overtake and embarrass our navigator. If such was his intention, a digression was both useless and prejudicial.

Garcia soon returned to his purpose, and led his party to Santa Aña, near which port the battle had taken place and Cabot was now stationed. His surprise at seeing Diego can best be imagined. No historian has left a particular account of their interview. Probably much displeasure manifested itself in his reception, and perhaps Garcia was pleased to perceive that his rival's force, what with mortality and the detachments at the forts, was much weakened. The new-comer repeated his demands of a surrender; insisting, upon grounds not very justifiable, on the sole right of discovery. Cabot was not a man to yield to such injustice; neither was he inclined, in a savage and obscure region, to involve his men in a contest, which, whoever got the better, must necessarily produce great distress. The result of their altercations cannot be known. In a short time they returned, not in much mutual cordiality, to Sanctus Spiritus. Garcia, having stationed at the forts a large body of his followers, who partook of his spirit, and from whom Cabot subsequently suffered inconvenience, left the country without delay.

Cabot's only course was to despatch messengers to Charles the Fifth, in order, by a candid account of his voyage, his treatment of the mutinous officers, and consequent change of destination, to counteract the calumnies which a disappointed rival might circulate in Spain. The persons so employed were Francis Calderon and George Barlow, and their original report is still in exist ence.* To understand fully the force of this document, it is necessary to bring before ourselves the hopes which Cabot's success in ascending the river, together with his ambitious temperament, naturally inspired.

At the commencement of the voyage, he was expected to touch at the western shore of America. "Having passed the winding strait of Magellan, he is to direct his course to the right hand, in the rear of our supposed continent." Accident had changed his course, and he now hoped, that, by continuing his ascent of the river, and by risking a few more contests with the savages, he should reach the intended coast by a route hitherto unknown. Besides, he observed that gold and silver ornaments were worn in profusion by several tribes along the La Plata, and, with his usual shrewdness, making friends of them, "he came to learn many secrets of the country." Having reached the waters which would lead him to the mines, he had possibly fixed his hopes on the reduction of a region, the riches of which would secure a competency to his party, and repay the generosity of his sovereign. In other expeditions he had been baffled; this discovery seemed indisputably his own.

We have no accounts of Garcia's efforts, on arriving in Europe, further than what is to be gathered from the ill-natured sneers of several historians. He was not idle, and in some quarters doubtless brought Cabot into disrepute. Perhaps he was exciting the Portuguese government to a decisive step in opposition. Whatever were his endeavors, he influenced not at all the mind of Charles the Fifth. Cabot's demands, in case of undertaking the great conquest, were "provision, ammunition, goods proper for trade, and a complete recruit of seamen and soldiers." These seeming exorbitant, the merchants interested in the squadron decided that their rights should escheat to the crown; but the Emperor, willing to avow his confidence in the navigator, agreed to stand personally responsible for the enterprise.

But Charles showed more generosity than foresight in this affair. At the very time of this proposal, Bourbon's soldiers were mutinous for pay; the Moluccas had been mortgaged;* and even the pecuniary assistance solicited by the Emperor from the Cortes had been refused. The good will of a king so straitened of necessity spent itself in promises.

It was at this time that Pizarro offered to reduce Peru solely at his own expense. He followed up the offer by personal importunity, and it was accepted. After an extravagant promise to provide every thing, and resign all conquests to the crown, the entire and exclusive range of the coast of Peru was granted to him; and thus was Cabot frustrated by the very sovereign who had nearly been his benefactor. If the seaman was at fault for immoderate requisitions, Charles was no less so for holding out hopes which his empty treasury could not fulfil. The facts in the case should clear the monarch from the imputations of neglect and dilatoriness, which many historians have cast upon his character.

During these negotiations in Spain, Cabot was awaiting anxiously the result of his embassy, and continuing to hope, until hope became folly. He was confirmed in his belief, that the waters of the Paraná would convey him to the mines of Potosí; and, while doubtful of the Emperor's pleasure, he improved and amused his men by exploring the country, and ascertaining the manners of the several tribes bordering on the La Plata. Whether the Emperor apprized him of his change of mind, or left him in uncertainty until he returned to Spain, their many delays must have been distressing to a band eager to penetrate a region, which promised a recompense for their previous deprivations.

Cabot and his crew were bold men, and left no region in the vicinity of the river unsearched. It required no little resolution in men anxiously expecting news from home, and who had seen one after another of their number drop away, to explore the strong-holds of savages, and gather knowledge at the risk of life and limb. One or two were often left in charge of the vessels, while the band rambled into the interior, trusting for shelter to the hospitality of the natives, or a temporary tent. The Spanish government, moreover, neglecting to send supplies, they were cast on their own resources for subsistence; and Herrera gives part of a report from Cabot to the Emperor, in which the productions of Brazil, and the improvements in various breeds of Spanish animals, are described with an accuracy of observation not unworthy the agriculturist or man of science. Cabot was endued with an elasticity of temper, which, united with sound principles and intelligence, enabled him to profit by every event. At home, he explained his projects to heedless sovereigns; at sea, won affection by courageous perseverance; and in a region of savages, while waiting the pleasure of his king, found time to instruct his followers, and stimulate them to industry.

Things were thus proceeding, when misfortune broke loose on the little community. Those of Garcia's party, whom he had left behind, wanting the good influence of a Cabot, fell one day into a violent dispute with the natives, and at length so enraged them, that they declared vengeance against every white man on the river. Of course the little garrisons at Sanctus Spiritus and St. Salvador, though not the offenders, did not escape the indignation of the savages. The most hostile tribe was the Guaranis, a wantonly ferocious people, whose animosity made them forget that they had entered into an explicit treaty of peace with our navigator. After the affront, several meetings were secretly held, until their sanguinary project was perfected.

One morning, just before daybreak, this blood-thirsty race rushed in a body upon Sanctus Spiritus. The inmates, a part surprised asleep, and a part fatigued with previous exertions, could offer no resistance, and the fort was carried. The savages, elated with their good fortune, next besieged St. Salvador. But by this time, the alarm had spread, and the admiral was able to maintain his position, until he could prepare one of his largest vessels for sea. The others he determined to leave behind. Collecting, therefore, all the supplies which could be obtained, the little band, much reduced in number, and driven before a tribe of Indians, embarked for their native country. They landed in Spain in the year 1531, exactly five years from the time of their departure.

CHAPTER IV.

Cabot's Reception in Spain. — Resumes the Office of Pilot-Major. — Account of a personal Interview with Cabot. — His private Character. — Relinquishes his Office and returns to England. — Edward the Sixth. — Charles the Fifth requests him to return to Spain. — His Occupations in England. — Errors with Regard to the Knighting of the Cabots.

CABOT was about fifty-three years of age when he returned to Spain, and, after his wild life in South America, we are glad to find him holding office in civilized society. It is not easy to say what was his reception at the Spanish court. One writer declares that he was received with coldness and ill nature, while the author of the "Memoir" strives to show that his report was perfectly satisfactory. Perhaps neither is entirely correct. The fact, that the merchants withdrew from the concern, shows them to have been disappointed, but surely Charles did not venture to frown on a man, whom he had ungenerously deluded, and who originated the project, that, in Pizarro's hands, now promised the monarch wealth and reputation.

The Spaniards were piqued at Cabot's severity

to the mutineers, but they could not sully the fame he had acquired by his conduct in the La Plata. His crew could bear witness to his composure in times of great and most varied danger. Moreover, his generosity in alluding to the better fortunes of Columbus won him many friends; without the jealousy of a selfish man, he did not hesitate to declare his exploits to be "more divine than human." For these and similar reasons his resumption of the office of Pilot-Major afforded general satisfaction, and for many years his occupation was one of great emolument and honor.

Several passages in the old authors show, as clearly as documents so imperfect and antiquated can show, that, besides being esteemed a strictly honorable man, he was the first navigator of the day. A thorough theorist, he had learned by practice how theory was useful. Charles the Fifth relied entirely on his opinion, which was always readily given. In all their intercourse no allusion is found to the character or progress of Pizarro. To the one, his name probably brought a twinge of conscience; and the other, however glad to aid a rival by his propositions, must have felt that the monarch's favors were unjustly conferred. A contemporary writer thus speaks of him at this time; "He is so valiant a man, and so well practised in all things pertaining to navigations, and the science of cosmographie, that at this present he hath not his like in all Spaine.” On another occasion, a gentleman of the time, desiring some important maritime information, was referred to Cabot; and his account of their personal interview, even now that three centuries have elapsed, is highly interesting. The writer says, “It was tolde mee that there was in the city a valiant man, a Venetian* born, named Sebastian Cabot, who had charge of the navigations of the Spaniards, being an expert man in that science, and one that could make cardes for the sea with his owne hand, and, by this report, seeking his acquaintance, I found him a very gentle and courteous person, who entertained mee friendly, and shewed mee many things, and among other a large mappe of the world, with certaine particuler navigations, as well of the Portugals as of the Spaniards, and he spake further unto mee to this effect.” †

Several like hints disclose to us the private character of Sebastian Cabot. His warm ambition was changed into maturer hopes, and we can anticipate an old age, calm, benevolent, and useful. Whilst holding the office of Pilot-Major, he frequently led in person small naval expeditions, which served to keep alive public interest, more than to promote discovery. His leisure was probably occupied with preparing the documents relative to his eventful life, which carelessness and accident have destroyed.

These were doubtless among the pleasantest years of Cabot's life. He had, indeed, considering his extensive plans, been singularly unsuccessful; neither does it appear that domestic comforts were gathered thickly around him. But he was a man whom many, like Richard Eden, delighted to consider their "very friend, and have sometimes keepe them company in their own houses." He had, moreover, done the world much service, only failing because he intended to do much more. He sought distinction, because it increased his usefulness.

He thus concludes a letter some years after the La Plata expedition. "After this I made many other voyages, which I now pretermit, and, waxing olde, I give myself to rest from such travels, because there are nowe many young and lustie pilots and mariners of good experience, by whose forwardness I do rejoyce in the fruit of my labours, and rest with the charge of this office, as you see."* This is the language of a man, who could view disappointment in the proper light, preferring a competency and the general respect to success gained by intrigue, or the favors showered upon a parasite. By this time he must have seen, that his name would never rival that of Columbus ; that it would even be shaded by it ; and yet we find him reviewing the past with gratitude, and anticipating the future with more than ordinary calmness.

Seventeen years thus elapsed, when the natural feeling of an old man induced Cabot to relinquish his situation in Spain, in order to dwell again in his native country. It is a pleasant thing, after all his wanderings, to see him turning his steps homeward. We rejoice when the recipient of foreign favor remembers the land which gave him birth. In the year 1548, while in full favor with the Emperor, he returned to England. Spain lost an exemplary officer ; he knew, better than any one, her naval interest, and his eminence was acknowledged both by the king and people. But Charles the Fifth had nothing to fear from Cabot's intimate knowledge of his affairs ; no combination of circumstances could have induced him to use his information against a sovereign, in whose confidence he had gained it.

Edward the Sixth had just reached the British throne, when our navigator returned, and fixed his residence in Bristol. Public hopes had been much raised touching the young king. Having enjoyed an excellent education, and naturally fond of naval affairs, it was thought that his reign would be memorable for the encouragement of maritime excellence. "In childhood," Burnet tells us "he knew all the harbors and ports both of his own dominions, and of France and Scotland, and how much water they had, and what was the way of coming into them." Add to this, that nature's other gifts exactly fitted him for a popular monarch, and that, in the second year of his reign, Sebastian Cabot, an old man respected in private life, and the greatest seaman of the age, became one of his subjects, and no one will fail to anticipate brilliant naval adventures.

When Charles the Fifth perceived this state of things, he repented that on any consideration he had lost his Pilot-Major; accordingly the English monarch received before long a formal demand, that "Sebastian Cabote, Grand Pilot of the Emperor's Indies, then in England, might be sent over to Spain, as a very necessary man for the Emperor, whose servant he was, and had a pension of him." These latter words might lead us to think that Charles, hoping his removal would be temporary, had wished to continue Cabot's pension; at any rate, it is gratifying to see what golden opinions the seaman had won by his services in Spain. The request was not complied with.

It is difficult to ascertain precisely what Cabot's office was after he returned to England. He had expected to continue in private life in his native city; but the importunities of Edward changed his determination, and it is supposed, by Hakluyt and others, that he was appointed to an office like that held under Charles the Fifth, then first created, and that he bore the title of Grand Pilot of England. However this may be, he was director of all maritime enterprises, being consulted, as we shall see, on every occasion, and experiencing in an eminent degree the royal munificence. Edward's respect for his character, and gratitude for his services, showed themselves by many marks of favor; among others a generous pension, as appears by the following document.

“Edward the Sixt, by the grace of God, King of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, to all Christian people, to whom these presents shall come, sendeth greeting. Know yee, that we, in consideration of the good and acceptable service done, and to be done, unto us by our beloved servant, Sebastian Cabota, of our speciale grace, certaine knowledge, meere motion, and by the advice and counsel of our most honourable uncle, Edward Duke of Somerset, governor of our person, and protector of our kingdomes, dominions, and subjects, and of the rest of our counsaile, have given and granted, and, by thē presents, do give and grant to the said Sebastian Cabota, a certain annuitie, or yerely revenue of one hundred, threescore and sixe pounds, t shillings four pence sterling, to have, enjoy, and yerely receive the foresaid annuities, or yerely revenue to the foresaid Sebastian Cabota during his natural life, out of our treasurie at the receipt of our exchequer at Westminster, at the hands of our treasurers and paymasters, there remayning for the time being, at the feast of the Annuntiation of the blessed Virgin Mary, the Nativitie of S. John Baptist, S. Michael y^e Archangel, and the Nativitie of our Lord, to be paid by equal portions. In witnesse whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patents; witnesse the King at Westminster the sixt day of January, in the second yeere of his raigne. The yeere of our Lord 1548." *

Besides the above, a salary was granted at the same rate, "from the feast of S. Michael last past unto this present time."

Cabot seems to have been much indebted in these affairs to the abovementioned uncle, the Duke of Somerset, who first introduced him to his royal nephew. The terms of the above pension would seem to show, that Cabot was actually in office; but of his duties we have no particular account. On one occasion we find a French pilot, with. "had frequented the coast of Brazil eighteen

“before Sebastian Cabote”; and a long anonymous article is recorded by Hakluyt, descriptive of the voyage “unto the mouth of the river of Plata, and along up within the sayd river,” which has been supposed with great plausibility to be Cabot’s own testimony. From these fragments of testimony, it is perhaps probable, that, without holding any formal title, he was regarded with universal confidence.

I shall now advert to a point, about which misrepresentation and error have thickly clustered. Nearly two thirds of the old writers confer on one or both of the Cabots the honors of knighthood. Campbell gives us the memoir of “Sir John Cabot,” and Purchas commences a couplet, —

“Hail, Sir Sebastian! England’s northern pole, Virginia’s finder,” &c.*

Henry, in his “History of Great Britain,” falls into a similar error; indeed, most readers may have expected to meet the subject of this biography with the title of knight. Now that modern ingenuity has given us the means, it is amusing to perceive how minute an error has caused the misapprehension. † fili Joannis Caboti militis aurati." This possessed just enough of oracular ambiguity to cause great trouble. Were the terms "militis aurati" to be applied to John or Sebastian? Purchas saw the portrait, and immediately knighted the latter, while Campbell quotes this very inscription to prove, that the father for certain services became Sir John Cabot. We have not mentioned either as having been knighted; and, if we will guard against inaccuracies of translation, we shall see that the above inscription affords no ground for ascribing such an honor to either. Eques and not miles would have been the Latin term to designate knighthood. Sir Humphrey Gilbert, Sir Hugh Willoughby, Sir Martin Frobisher, and Sir Francis Drake are mentioned by Hakluyt, each with the term eques auratus, and no other of their rank is once styled otherwise.*

* Hakluyt, Vol. III. p. 137. A particular account of this portrait is contained in the appendix to the "Memoir of Cabot." It is believed to have been painted by Holbein. The picture is now in the United States, having been purchased by Mr. Richard Biddle.

THE remainder of our narrative will contain none of the bustle of adventure ; but it will exhibit what is rather remarkable, a man of more than threescore years and ten, devoting himself to the illustration of new truths, and originating great national enterprises. Cabot's mind retained to the last its vigor, and the experience of his manhood was an unfailing fund of information.

In one of his early voyages he observed a variation in the magnetic needle ; but his observations, although carefully recollected, at the time only found a place in his memorandum book. No theory of the variation had been started ; and, until he could frame one, he chose to say little of what he had seen. Thirty years afterwards, the mystery still remaining inexplicable, he was surprised to perceive the same phenomenon in the La Plata. His active and roving life then prevented him from giving much attention to the subject, and he could only note carefully the variations, now and then stealing a moment to seek the solution of the problem.

During all changes of fortune, he did not forget what he had seen ; and availing himself of the information of contemporaries, he now announced a matured theory of the variation of the needle. There is something in this, characteristic of the man. He mostly withheld his observations for forty years, lest the superstitious might reject or fear what the scientific could not explain. Had he been less cautious, he would have been indisputably acknowledged the discoverer of this great wonder of nature.

When Edward heard of Cabot's theory of the variation, with his usual ardor he insisted on a convocation of the learned men of the kingdom, before whom the venerable seaman had the honor of explaining the phenomenon to his young sovereign. He showed the extent of the variation, and that it was different in different latitudes. Unfortunately we are without the papers of Cabot himself, and are thus unable to know precisely the theory offered to the prince. Although not the correct one, it attracted general attention, and added to the esteem which our navigator now enjoyed in his native land.*

Notwithstanding young Edward's willingness to encourage maritime enterprise, English commerce, about the year 1551, became almost extinct. Native produce was in no demand; and, while foreign nations easily found markets, there seemed to be a general stagnation in the trade, which had once raised England to opulence. This affected equally the pride and purses of the English merchants, and they resolved to detect the cause of the evil, and reëstablish their credit. The first men in the kingdom took the matter in hand; "certaine grave citizens of London, and men of great wisdom and carefull for the good of their countrey, began to thinke with themselves howe this mischief might bee remedied." After conferring on the subject, they agreed to consult Sebastian Cabot. "And whereas at the same time one Sebastian Cabota, a man in those days very renowned, happened to be in London, they began first of all to deale and consult diligently with him." From this moment Cabot's influence is perceptible in every stage of the investigation.

* Livio Sanuto, a noble Venetian, on learning Cabot's eminence from a friend, applied to him for information on the subject of magnetic variation, and received a chart marked with the degrees in various parts of the world, and a full account of his several observations.

He was enabled to propose a project, which he had long since conceived, and which has eventually secured to England one of her most valuable branches of trade. He advised his countrymen to seek a new northern market, telling them, that, although neighboring nations had been sated with their commodities, doubtless tribes might be found to remunerate their ingenuity. The proposition seeming favorable to the merchants and the King, it was agreed that three ships "should be prepared and furnished for the search and discovery of the northern part of the world."

But, at this point, the adventurers were opposed by a powerful foreign corporation, established in London, under the title of The Stilyard, and claiming, what they had long possessed, a monopoly of the trade with the northern European ports. It consisted chiefly of the factors of extensive mercantile houses in Antwerp and Hamburg, who, by art and good fortune, had obtained command of most English markets, and used their superiority to ruin native merchants. Their impositions had become insufferable ; and now, when they endeavored to fetter lawful enterprise, Cabot determined to rid his country of such an incumbrance. He ascertained them to be guilty of certain fraudulent acts, and, in the name of the new company, laid a remonstrance before Edward's privy council.

Such an established favorite was not likely to offer a fruitless petition, particularly as the young King must himself have perceived the justice of the complaints. Parts of his Majesty's private journal, which have been preserved, show his interest in the dispute, and the result is recorded, one may fancy, with something like triumph. "February 23d, 1551. A decree was made by the board, that, upon knowledge and information of their charters, they had found ; first, that they (the Stilyard) were no sufficient corporation ; secondly, that their number, names, and nature was unknown ; thirdly, that, when they had forfeited their liberties, King Edward the Fourth did restore them on this condition, that they should color no strangers' goods, which they had done. For these considerations, sentence was given that they had forfeited their liberties, and were in like case with other strangers."

When the Stilyard heard the decision, they were so reluctant to relinquish their monopolies, that ambassadors were immediately despatched to the English court, "to speak in their behalf." Again the matter came before the Privy Council, and the former judgment was confirmed. A few days after this memorable defeat, Cabot received a donation from the King. "To Sebastian Cabota, the great seaman, two hundred pounds, by way of the King's majesty's reward, dated in March, 1551." This tells more plainly than any comment, of his successful exertions in the affair.

Obstacles being removed, the expedition rapidly advanced. Great pains were taken to provide plank, "very strong and well seasoned," master workmen were engaged in the construction of the vessels, the merchants spared no expense in the provision of stores, and, for the first time in England, the ships' bottoms were sheathed with copper. Sir Hugh Willoughby, with whose melancholy fate most readers are familiar, was, after some debate, appointed Chief Captain; "both," as we are told, "by reason of his goodly personage, (for he was of tall stature,) as also for his singular skill in the services of warre." The second in command was Richard Chancellor, a shrewd and persevering man, who had been educated with much care by the father of Sir Philip Sidney. We may form some idea of Cabot's strength of mind, when we know, that, although between seventy and eighty years old, he superintended personally these extensive outfits; but our admiration should not stop here. That nothing might be wanting to complete success, he wrote, with his own hand, a volume of instructions in duty,* which were ordered to be read before the ships' companies every week, and which have ever been regarded as a model of high principle and good sense, as well as a proof of sagacity and an extended knowledge of human nature.

On the 20th of May, 1553, naval stores and crews were in readiness, and the squadron, consisting of the Bona Esperanza, of one hundred and twenty tons, Sir Hugh Willoughby master, the Edward Bonaventure, of one hundred and sixty tons, Richard Chancellor master, and the Bona Confidentia, of ninety tons, Cornelius Durfooth master, each furnished with a pinnace and boat, dropped down the river to Greenwich. The spirits of the men were high, amid the bustle of leave-taking and crowds of spectators, although occasionally damped by bidding farewell to familiar faces, which the dangers before them rendered it probable many would behold no more. The large ships floating slowly downward, the sailors dressed all alike in "watchet or skie-colored cloth," and the crowded decks, filled with impatient crews, must have formed a highly exciting scene.

* They were entitled, "Ordinances, Instructions, and Advertisements of, and for the Direction of, the intended Voyage for Cathay, compiled, made, and delivered by the right worshipful M. Sebastian Cabota, Esq., Governour of the Mysterie and Companie of the Merchants, Adventurers," &c. &c.

The court happened to be at Greenwich as they approached; and "presently the courtiers came running out, and the common people flockt together, standing very thick upon the shoare; the privie counsel, they lookt out at the windows of the court, and the rest ranne up to the toppes of the towers; the shippes hereupon discharge their ordinance, and shoot off their pieces after the manner of warre, and of the sea, insomuch that the toppes of the hills sounded therewith, the valleys and the waters gave an echo, and the mariners, they shouted in such sort, that the skie rang again with the noise thereof." *

The only thing to lessen the happiness of the occasion, was the absence of the young monarch, whose exertions had given existence to the expedition. He beheld none of the regrets or rejoicings, being confined by the illness which soon caused his death. As the vessels left port, shrouds and mainyards were crowded by those eager to take the last look of recognition; presently the land faded in the distance, and, mutually agreeing to meet at the castle of Wardhouse, in Norway, should mischance disperse the squadron, they committed themselves to the Ruler of the ocean.

* Hakluyt, Vol. I. p. 245.

We cannot follow minutely this band of adventurers. We have spoken thus much of it, because their enterprise was the last of importance in which Cabot was concerned, and because of the distinguished services he rendered it, at a time of life when most are content to repose in ease and inaction. The dreaded evil was experienced, and, on the very day of the agreement to keep together, the vessels were separated by a furious tempest. Sir Hugh Willoughby, finding a passage to the east impracticable, resolved, on the 18th of September, to winter with Durfooth in Lapland. But the severity of the climate proved fatal to the wearied frames of their party, and their heroic commander was obliged to behold his men fall victims to a death, whose horrors were soon to overtake himself.

One of the most melancholy records ever preserved, is Sir Hugh's manuscript journal, detailing their fruitless attempts to reach Wardhouse, their resolution to pass the winter on an unknown coast, and their extreme destitution after the landing was effected. The commander, it is supposed, lingered until the month of January, 1554; the two ships were found deserted and decayed, and the journal lying beside the body of its author. The sad diary is said to have contained a description of the wolves and other carnivorous animals, which flocked around the bodies of the first victims to the climate. The last entry is thus mournfully abrupt. "September. We sent out three men south-southwest, to search if they could find people, who went three dayes journey, but could find none ; after that, we sent other three men westward foure dayes journey, which also returned without finding any people. Then sent we three men southeast three dayes journey, who, in like sorte, returned without finding of people, or any similitude of habitation." "Here endeth," the historian adds, "Sir Hugh Willoughbie his note, which was written with his owne hand."*

Richard Chancellor had the good fortune to reach Wardhouse, whence with singular resolution he prosecuted his voyage, and, after a passage through unknown latitudes, where the sunlight was perpetual, he landed at Archangel. The inhabitants at first fled in terror ; but, mindful of Cabot's injunctions, he so succeeded in soothing their apprehensions by mild treatment, that they threw themselves at his feet, and supplied him liberally with such things as he needed. The natives being forbidden by the emperor to trade with foreigners, several undertook a journey to Moscow, in order to represent to him the object of Chancellor in visiting their shores. The emperor received the representation with courtesy, and invited the Englishman to a personal interview. Chancellor of course embraced the opportunity, and, providing himself with a sledge, soon reached the city of Moscow. He there related the design of his voyage, and before long laid the foundation of a permanent and extensive trade between England and Russia.

There is something heart-stirring in the manful efforts of these early travellers; they teach us of modern times a good lesson of self-forgetting, generous enthusiasm. Chancellor so represented the views and intentions of the English government, that Russia, it would seem, with little hesitation, acceded to his propositions. In the year 1554 or 1555, a charter was granted to the company of English adventurers, and Sebastian Cabot, in consideration of having originated the enterprise, was therein named governor for life.

Soon afterwards the Emperor of Russia granted them certain privileges, which show their commercial intercourse to have been extensive. The articles are called, "A Copie of the first Privileges graunted by the Emperor of Russia to the English Marchants in the Yeere 1555," and thus commence; "John Vasilvich, by the grace of God, Emperor of Russia, Great Duke of Novogrode, Moscovia, &c. To all people that shall see, reade, heare, or understand these presents, greeting. Know ye, therefore, that we of our grace speciale, meere motion, certaine knowledge, have given and granted, and by these presents for us, our heires, and successours, do give and grant as much as in us is and lieth, unto Sebastian Cabota, Governour, Sir George Barnes, Knight," &c.*

From this time the Russia trade increased in value and extent, until it gave a fresh impulse to productive industry in England. Instead of suffering under foreign monopolies, native artisans found fair markets; while, on the other hand, its intercourse with the English gradually secured to the Russian nation, civilization, intelligence, and comfort. Cabot must have observed with unspeakable delight the ultimate success of this expedition. Four ships were purchased for the trade, and their number annually increased.

Probably the earliest specimens of the English mercantile style, are to be found in the correspondence between the Russian and English companies at this period.† The first articles of barter were cloths, tar, hemp, and feathers; afterward they shipped copper, steel, and in short those various products, both natural and artificial, which form the basis of all commerce between civilized nations. As if by magic, the complete stagnation in English trade was succeeded by a healthy mercantile circulation.

The Emperor continued his favors toward the new traders, and a branch of the company was established at Moscow. He sent an ambassador to England with instructions to complete and confirm the arrangement. The Russia trade soon became important. It was conceived with much boldness, and sustained with unfailing spirit. Cabot was the director of every movement; his old age, instead of gliding away in debility or sloth, was occupied by the innumerable cares arising from his connexion with the adventurers. The whale fishery of Spitzbergen, and the famous Newfoundland fisheries, were improved, if not established by him at this period. His ambition seems to have been, to do good to the last moment. "With strict justice," observes Campbell, "it may be said of Sebastian Cabot, that he was the author of our maritime strength, and opened the way to those improvements, which have rendered us so great, so eminent, so flourishing a people."

Cabot was now eighty years old; and, after following him through so many changes of fortune, we have to regret, that gloom should overspread his latter days. But, like many others who have depended on the justice of crowned heads, he found, that gratitude did not invariably follow meritorious exertion. We must retrace our steps a moment to ascertain the origin of the vexations we are going to record.

Not long after the departure of the first expedition to Russia, young Edward died. This monarch had respected Cabot's age, and recompensed his talents ; he had given life to naval enterprise by liberality, and won the confidence of his subjects by an intimate acquaintance with their interests. His death was in many respects a public loss. To Cabot, as the sequel shows, it was almost ruinous.

The King was a warm Protestant ; and, on the accession of the Catholic Mary, eager to spread her bigoted faith, his favorites stood no chance of fair treatment. It is not probable, that insult was shown to the venerable navigator, but he was regarded with coldness, doubly severe because partially concealed ; he was made often to feel his dependence on the crown, and he saw younger men daily gaining the royal confidence to which he was entitled.

The first open neglect was in regard to his means of support. His pension, which expired at Edward's death, was not renewed for more than two years. His cheerfulness did not desert him now that his private circumstances were inauspicious. Without pretending to be a philosopher, he used all with benevolence and generosity, uniting, as is the privilege of age, good counsel and a good example. The following extract from the journal of Stephen Burroughs gives us much insight into his character.

“The 27th being Munday, the right worshipful Sebastian Cabota came aboard our pinesse at Gravesende, accompanied with divers gentlemen and gentlewomen, who, after that they had viewd our pinesse, and tasted of such cheer as we could make them aboard, they went on shore, giving to our mariners right liberal rewards; and the good olde gentleman, master Cabota, gave to the poore most liberall almes, wishing them to pray for the good fortune and prosperous success of the Searchthrift, our pinesse. And then, at the signe of the Christopher, hee and his friends banketed, and made me, and them that were in the company, great cheere; and so very joy that he had to see the towardness of our intended discovery, he entered into the dance himselfe, among the rest of the young and lusty company; which being ended, hee and his friends departed, most gently commending us to the governance of Almighty God.”* This gayety of temper is remarkable, considering his private necessities. The remainder of his career is brief and gloomy.

The Queen had occupied the throne but one year, when, to the dismay of her subjects, she gave her hand to Philip of Spain. Matters had already undergone a disagreeable change, and this union with an intriguing and jealous sovereign promised England little advantage. Philip came into his new dominions exceedingly envious of the English naval superiority ; and Cabot, the man to whom it was chiefly ascribable, and who had refused the order of Philip's father to return to Spain, could hope little courtesy at his hands. Philip's first act was to declare war against France, and Mary was forced to resort to all expedients to supply the requisite funds. Seven days after the King reached London, Cabot resigned his pension. Of the neglect and cold insinuations which led to such a step, and of the wounded feelings of the beneficiary, no one, who knows the state of the kingdom and the character of the man, can fail to conceive.

Shortly afterward, indeed, the pension was renewed, but no longer in favor of Cabot alone. One half was granted to a William Worthington. With Mary the new favorite was in the ascendant ; she committed to Worthington all Cabot's manuscripts, which have since eluded the most patient search.

The neglect, which we have lately seen shown to him, followed him to the last ; and but for his friend Richard Eden, we had known nothing of his end. Eden stood by his death-bed, and he tells us, with his usual simplicity, that "the good old man had not even in the article of death shaken off all worldlie vanitie." He still hovered over the scene of his adventures; he thought of his boyhood, and, with that sudden mental illumination, which precedes the more perfect light of another existence, reviewing his past struggles, he "spoke flightily" of a divine revelation with regard to an infallible method of ascertaining the longitude, which he might disclose to no mortal. Truly, the ruling passion was strong in death! He died calmly as he had lived; and, it is supposed, in the city of London. But although, as has been well said, "he gave a continent to England," we know neither the date of his death, nor does the humblest monument show where his remains were interred.

Such were the adventures, and such is an outline of the character, of Sebastian Cabot. His mind, perhaps, cannot be properly regarded as of the highest order. It was better fitted to investigate by help of data, than to create for itself; to draw sound conclusions, than to wander in speculations. He had strong common sense, and could view the most intricate subjects clearly and calmly; he had command over himself, over his feelings, and over his mental powers. Hence, he was composed in danger, and cheerful in affliction; and, being generally directed by high moral principle, failure, of which he experienced a great deal, was robbed of half its pangs. He erred at times in judgment, and often conceived what he could not execute. But what he discovered and divulged is of the highest value; and, in a career like his, a man must attempt much to accomplish even a little. He conferred many benefits on his fellow men; and, although he received very inadequate compensation, he was always a good citizen, a warm friend, and a faithful public officer

THE materials of the following narrative are found partly in the "Life of General Eaton," published in Brookfield in 1813, but chiefly in the original papers, which were left by him, and which have been obligingly put into our hands by the gentleman to whom they belong. These papers consist of private and official letters, and copious journals kept by General Eaton during a great part of his public life. It is remarkable that he should have found time, in the midst of his vexatious official duties, and more than romantic adventures, to write so much, and, what is of considerable importance to those who have occasion to read his manuscripts, in so clear and beautiful a hand. General Eaton's extraordinary capacity for action, the energy and zeal with which he discharged the duties of his office as consul for the regency of Tunis, and the singularity of his adventures during his march from Egypt through the Desert of Barca, in 1805, entitle him to a place among those who have distinguished themselves by their public acts. The reader will be struck with the manly tone of his official correspondence in relation to the Barbary Powers, and the true policy to be adopted towards that nest of pirates. He will also feel humiliated, that his country, in common with the rest of Christendom, submitted so long to the exactions of barbarous hordes, equally contemptible in character, strength, and resources.

WILLIAM EATON.

CHAPTER I.

Eaton's Birth, Parentage, and early Life. — His Appointment in the Army. — His Marriage

WILLIAM EATON was born at Woodstock, in Connecticut, on the 23d of February, 1764. His parents were in the middling rank of life, and brought up a large family, with moderate means. His father was a farmer, and for many years eked out his narrow income, by teaching school during the winter; an employment for which he is represented as having been well qualified by more than ordinary attainments for a farmer. He died November 23d, 1804.

William, the subject of this biography, showed very early in life, an extraordinary vigor of character. The rustic labor of a farmer's life had no charms for his lively imagination; but reading and the sports of the field were his special delight. When he was ten years old, his family removed from Woodstock to Mansfield; and here his turn for hardy adventure was still more unfolded. At the age of sixteen he ran away, and enlisted in the army. In a little more than a year his health failed him, and he was obliged to set out for home. On the journey he was disabled from proceeding by lameness, and, during this awkward interval, supported himself in the family of a farmer by mending old chairs. At the expiration of a few weeks, however, his father went after him and carried him back. As soon as his health was restored, he rejoined the army, and remained in the service until April, 1783, when he was discharged, having attained the honors of a sergeant.

Soon after this, his mind seems to have taken a more decided literary turn; and in 1784 he began the study of the classical languages, under the instruction of the Reverend Mr. Nott, of Franklin; and in 1785, becoming religiously affected, he was made a member of the church of that place. In the same year he was admitted a student in Dartmouth College; and, according to the customary indulgence extended by that and other colleges of New England, the indigent students received permission to teach school during the ensuing winter. But Eaton was prevented by domestic embarrassments, from renewing his connexion with the College until two years later, in 1787, when he was again admitted, and became a member of the Freshman class. He began his occupation as a teacher in November, 1785, in Windham, and continued until June, 1786, giving a portion of his time to college studies, under the instruction of the Reverend Mr. Cogswell. He then returned to his father's farm in Mansfield, where he divided his time between study and agriculture during that summer. In November, he recommenced his school in Windham, and continued in it until March, 1787. In May of the same year, he started on foot, his pack on his back with a few "notions" to sell, and one pistareen only in his pocket, for Dartmouth College. This scanty fund was exhausted when he arrived at Northfield; and in this destitute condition he gave way to an uncontrollable depression of spirits. This, however, was but transient. What with the proceeds of the sale from his pack, and other assistance rendered him on the way, he was enabled to complete his journey, and was received by Dr. Wheelock, the well-known president of the College, with great kindness. He was examined, and became, as has been stated above, a member of the Freshman class.

From this time Mr. Eaton continued a member of the College, supporting himself, in part at least, by teaching winter schools. The great exertions he was obliged to make, to keep up with the studies of his class, impaired his health, and made it necessary for him to take a journey. On the 25th of August, 1790, he was admitted to the degree of bachelor of arts, and delivered, with a classmate named Jackson, a poetical dialogue at the Commencement of that year.

Having completed his collegiate course, Eaton again opened a school in Windsor, which he continued up to August, 1791. In the October of that year, he was chosen clerk to the House of Delegates of the State of Vermont.

During the next winter, Mr. Eaton made a visit to Connecticut, and renewed his acquaintance with the respectable family of General Timothy Danielson, whose youthful widow he afterwards married. In the following March, he received, through the influence of the Honorable Stephen R. Bradley, a senator of the United States from Vermont, the appointment of captain in the army, which he accepted. In May, he received orders from the Department of War to proceed to Bennington, where recruits were assembling under his ensign, Charles Hyde, of whom he immediately assumed the command, and entered vigorously on the recruiting service himself. About this time, he took the first three degrees in Freemasonry. On the 21st of the following August, he was married to the lady whom we have spoken of above, Mrs. Eliza Danielson, at Union, Connecticut, and immediately proceeded with his wife to Windsor, Vermont. We have now arrived at the period when, properly speaking, the narrative of Mr. Eaton's active life commences.

— His Engagement in the Recruiting Service.
— Service in Georgia. — Trial by a Court-Martial, and Sentence.*

CAPTAIN EATON, having received marching orders, proceeded in September, 1793, with his troops to Albany, and thence to New York and Philadelphia. From the latter city he went to Pittsburg, where he was presented to General Wayne, and soon after joined the army at Legionville. The only affair of any consequence in which he was at this time engaged was a quarrel with the adjutant-general, Butler, which, though not greatly to the credit of either party, fortunately ended without bloodshed. At a general review in March, 1793, Eaton was placed in command of the left column of the army. In the course of the manœuvres, the general had ordered Eaton's column to form the line in the flank, and, after the firing was over, the acting adjutant-general directed them to return in the same order in which they had marched on the ground, by files from the right, countermarch. Eaton ordered the two wings to countermarch from the left and centre. The adjutant-general then countermanded his own order, by directing Eaton to countermarch by the left; but Eaton, being confident that he was bringing the column into the right position, continued his march. This resulted in a violent altercation on the spot between these two officers. Butler rode toward Eaton with uplifted sword, and was met in his advance by the other, with his esponton. This disorderly and unofficerlike scene was ended by the general, who directed the march to continue. But Eaton, deeming himself entitled to the usual satisfaction of a military man, sent the adjutant the following rather enigmatical epistle.

“ Legionville, 17th March, 5 o'clock, P. M.

“ SIR,

I am to understand, and am to be understood by, Captain Butler.

EATON.

“ The acting Adjutant-General.”

The Acting Adjutant seems to have been a little puzzled about understanding Eaton's despatch; he answered it, however, with a proposition of a general explanation in the presence of the gentlemen who commanded in Eaton's column; a proposition that met with a prompt acceptance. The meeting was held at “ Captain Price's hut ”; and, after some deliberation, the gentlemen to whom the subject was referred, judiciously decided, that, as both "were unfortunate in being culpable, so it is incumbent on both to come forward and bury the matter in oblivion, by again renewing their former friendship." Captain Butler assented to this opinion, offered Eaton his hand, and here the matter ended. This anecdote is of little consequence, except that it shows qualities of character, which influenced the conduct of Eaton at every subsequent period of his life.

Eaton arrived at Cincinnati, with the army, on the 5th of May. He gives a glowing description of the beauty and fertility of that region, a picture, in some respects, contrasting wonderfully with the present cultivated appearance of that populous and wealthy part of the country.

During Eaton's connexion with the western army, which continued till February, 1794, he was engaged in several skirmishes, and participated in the erection of Fort Recovery. Having at this time obtained leave of absence, he returned to Brimfield, by the way of Philadelphia. The following June, he engaged again in the recruiting service at Springfield, by request of the secretary of war, and continued in it until 1795, when he was ordered to Georgia. He embarked at Philadelphia, with his troops, on the 1st of December, and encountered a violent storm on the voyage, accompanied with thunder and lightning, which he commemorated in a series of heroic verses, more remarkable for sounding words than poetic diction, addressed to Mrs. Eaton. He arrived safely at Savannah on the 26th of the month, and proceeded thence to the station at St. Mary's to report himself to the commanding officer, Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Gaither. Captain Eaton's time and labor were immediately devoted to the building of a fort at Colerain, which he called Fort Pickering; "not, however," says he, "that I might satirize a good man, by erecting his monument in the mud." The object of the force at St. Mary's was to establish a trading factory, to hold in check the Indians and Spaniards, and to repress any violence on the part of disorderly citizens of Georgia, towards the inhabitants of Florida. In May of this year, commissioners arrived, on the part of the United States, to negotiate a treaty with the Creek Indians, which they effected in the June following, and thus accomplished the main object for which the troops had been marched to that station.

While Eaton was engaged at this place, a misunderstanding grew up between him and Colonel Gaither, the commandant, which led to the arrest and trial of the former by a court-martial. This trial is of some consequence, because an attempt was made at the trial of Colonel Burr, in Richmond, to set aside the testimony of Eaton, for rea sons drawn from these proceedings. Upon a review of all the evidence now to be had in the case, there can be but little doubt that Eaton was the object of unjust and harsh treatment from his commandant. It is very likely that Eaton's manners were offensive and impetuous, and that his mode of discharging the duties of his office was any thing but conciliating to Colonel Gaither. Captain Eaton was arrested in August, though he had twice, before that time, demanded, in writing, a court of inquiry, and once verbally, for the purpose of showing that the reports circulated to his disadvantage were without foundation. To this privilege he was legally entitled; but the granting of it did not suit the object of Colonel Gaither. The court-martial consisted of five members, one major, two captains, and two ensigns, all of whom, excepting the president, were inferior in rank to Eaton. The trial lasted more than a fortnight, and every effort was made to crush the character of the prisoner. He was charged with speculating on the men under his command; with detaining in his hands bounty money, and paying them in goods at an advanced price; with selling public corn, and allowing the public horses only two quarts per day; with disobedience of orders; with liberating a soldier, who had been charged with causing the death of another, and tearing in pieces the charge in a contemptuous manner; and with defrauding the troops under his command of rations due to them, which were never accounted for to the men. To these charges Eaton made a long and elaborate reply, which he afterwards transmitted to the secretary of state, Colonel Pickering. His defence is minute and able. It is characterized by rude, fierce, and sometimes by figurative language, that rises to eloquence. He is not sparing of invective, and does not hesitate to charge his enemies with the basest motives. The origin of the commandant's hostility to him he expressly attributes to that officer's resentment for his refusal to purchase lands held by Gaither in the "Yazoo Grants," and obtained in a manner which Eaton openly reprobated. He charges upon him, also, a close connexion with a person owning large tracts in the vicinity of the post, and that the place had been selected with a view to gainful speculations, though wholly unsuitable for a military station or a trading factory, for reasons specifically detailed. The truth of the latter charge rests not on the credibility of Eaton's declaration alone; for Ensign Thompson, a member of the court-martial, positively asserts, that the commandant had "ordered Eaton to make no reports, although the secretary of war had given instruction that he should." Eaton obeyed the instructions of the secretary, and, as his reports were unfavorable to the private wishes of Colonel Gaither and his friends, the sacrifice of the subordinate seems to have been resolved upon, as a necessary measure for the protection of their pecuniary interests.

The tenor of Eaton's defence is too bold and uncompromising for a man conscious of guilt ; and the testimonies to his excellent conduct, by the people in the neighborhood of his station, forbid the supposition that Colonel Gaither's charges were founded in truth. The court-martial, also, seem to have felt the force of his arguments ; for, though a majority were decidedly hostile, and every effort was made during five months preceding the trial to collect testimony against him, they yet sentenced him merely to two months' suspension from command. The proceedings of the court-martial were sent to the commandant for his approval ; but, instead of acting upon their decision, as it was his duty to do, he arbitrarily imprisoned Eaton in Fort Pickering, despatched the proceedings of the court to the secretary of war, and ordered Eaton, after a month's confinement, to the seat of government. The sentence was not confirmed. Eaton was told, on application to the secretary, that his standing in the army was not changed.

In January, 1797, Eaton returned to Brimfield, and remained there until the following summer. In July he was commissioned by the secretary of state to execute the orders of a committee of Congress, appointed to procure information relative to Blount's conspiracy. Under this confidential commission, he was ordered to proceed to New York, and secure the person of Dr. Nicholas Romaine, with his papers. Eaton executed this order with the greatest promptitude, having brought the prisoner to Philadelphia in less than two days after his departure from that city. On his return from this expedition, he received the appointment of American consul in Tunis; but, previous to his departure for the place of his destination, he was charged with despatches for Mr. Gerry, then in Cambridge, and on the point of sailing for France. Having delivered them with punctuality, he revisited Brimfield, where he passed the autumn. In the winter he made a journey to Ohio, and returned in the following March. He remained at home from that time till the 12th of November, when he received notice from the secretary of state, that the vessels destined for Algiers were ready to sail. He accordingly took leave of his family, and arrived at the seat of government on the 18th of the same month. From this time the most important period of General Eaton's public life commences. He was placed in a station, which gave an ample scope to the energy of his vigorous character, and to his love of strange adventures. The theatre of his action henceforth was in a barbarous country, the distance and character of which lend a romantic charm to his way of life and his singular achievements ; though the remoteness of the scene has contributed to throw his real claims upon the memory of his countrymen into obscurity.

CHAPTER III.

Eaton embarks for Algiers. — His Arrival there, and Presentation at Court. — Departure for Tunis. — He is delayed by contrary Winds. — Arrival at Tunis, and Reception by Famin. — Friendly Warning of the British Consul

MR. EATON embarked on board the United States brig Sophia, bound to Algiers, on the 22d of December, 1798. The Sophia sailed in company with the Hero, the Hassan Bashaw, the Skjoldabrand, and the Lela Eisha, all destined by the United States as payment of stipulations and arrearages due to the Dey of Algiers. The Sophia had a passage of thirty-six days from the Capes of Delaware to the Bay of Algiers, where she arrived on the 9th of February, 1799. James L. Cathcart, the United States consul at Tripoli, had taken passage in the same vessel. Eaton and Cathcart waited immediately on Mr. O'Brien, the Consul-General of the United States for the Barbary coast, and remained with him until March. On the 22d of February they were presented at the palace, the armed vessels having been delivered to the Regency a few days previously. The following extract from Eaton's journal gives a pithy account of the ceremonies on that occasion.

“February 22d.—Consul O’Brien, Cathcart, and myself, Captain Geddes, Smith, Penrose, Maley, proceeded from the American house to the courtyard of the palace, uncovered our heads, entered the area of the hall, ascended a winding maze of five flights of stairs, to a narrow dark entry, leading to a contracted apartment, of about twelve by eight feet, the private audience room. Here we took off our shoes, and, entering the cave (for so it seemed) with small apertures of light with iron grates, we were shown to a huge shaggy beast, sitting on his rump, upon a low bench, covered with a cushion of embroidered velvet, with his hind legs gathered up like a tailor or a bear. On our approach to him, he reached out his fore paw as if to receive something to eat. Our guide exclaimed, ‘Kiss the Dey’s hand!’ The Consul-General bowed very elegantly, and kissed it, and we followed his example in succession. The animal seemed, at that moment, to be in a harmless mode; he grinned several times, but made very little noise. Having performed this ceremony, and standing a few moments in silent agony, we had leave to take our shoes and other property, and leave the den, without any other injury than the humility [humiliation] of being obliged, in this involuntary manner, to violate the second command of God, and offend common decency.”

On the 2nd of March, Eaton sailed from Algiers

for Tunis, but was forced by contrary winds into the Bay of Biserta. Here he went on shore, and sent a courier by land with a letter to Azulai, a Jewish merchant of Tunis, requesting him to provide a house with suitable accommodations, that should be ready on his arrival. He was unable to reëmbark until the 10th, on account of the surf, caused by a strong wind blowing into the mole, and a current setting out ; in the mean time he accepted the hospitality of Stephen Decoster, an Italian, and acting vice-consul for the Emperor, Holland, and Ragusa. On the 12th, the Sophia came to anchor in the Bay of Tunis. The ship's papers were immediately exhibited to the Aga of the marine, who promised to send the necessary information to the Bey. On the 14th, permission was received from the Bey to go on shore, and they proceeded immediately in a barge to the city. As no house had as yet been provided, they took up their abode for the present with M. Famin, a Frenchman, who had heretofore been the agent of the United States at Tunis. The flags of the different European nations at peace with the Regency were hoisted at the consular houses, and the afternoon of the same day was spent in receiving visits. Mr. Eaton was cautioned, immediately on his arrival, against placing any confidence in M. Famin. The British consul intimated, that Famin was a dangerous personage, and that Eaton's situation was a very critical one. He advised the American consul to unite caution and firmness in the negotiation, and told him, "that the Bey was a man of acute discernment, and generally of fair dealing, but that he was vain and avaricious."

Being thus forewarned, both of the character of the Bey, and of the French agent of the United States, Eaton had his first interview on the 15th. As the immediate business, which he had to discuss with the government of Tunis, grew out of an article, in a treaty negotiated by M. Famin on the part of the United States, which article had been rejected by the Senate, it will be proper to give some account of the disputed stipulation, before proceeding to the diplomatic intercourse of Mr. Eaton with that regency.

CHAPTER IV.

Treaty negotiated by Famin. — Article rejected by the Senate. — Stipulations. — Other Articles objected to. — Instructions of Mr Secretary Pickering to the American Consuls. — Interviews of Eaton with the Bey, and Negotiations with his Ministers.

JOSEPH ETIENNE FAMIN, who is mentioned in the preceding chapter, had been employed by Joel Barlow, Consul-General of the United States for the Barbary Powers, as American agent in Tunis. He had concluded the negotiation of a treaty of peace and friendship between the United States and the Bey and government of Tunis, in August, 1797, which was laid before the Senate in the March of the following year. The treaty was ratified, with the exception of the fourteenth article, which related to the duties on merchandise, to be reciprocally paid by the citizens and subjects of the parties in their respective ports. The article objected to by the Senate, was expressed as follows.

“The citizens of the United States of America, who shall transport into the kingdom of Tunis the merchandise of their country in the vessels of their nation, shall pay three per cent duty. Such as may be laden by such citizens under a foreign flag, coming from the United States or elsewhere, shall pay ten per cent duty. Such as may be laden by foreigners on board of American vessels, coming from any place whatever, shall also pay ten per cent duty. If any Tunisian merchant wishes to carry merchandise from his country, under any flag whatever, into the United States of America, and on his own account, he shall pay three per cent duty."

The Senate resolved, "that it be recommended to the President of the United States, to enter into a friendly negotiation with the Bey and government of Tunis, on the subject of the said article, so as to accommodate the provision thereof to the existing treaties of the United States with other nations."

Although the Senate ratified the treaty, with the exception of the abovesited article, there were stipulations in others, which were found objectionable, and of which the American agents were instructed by the Secretary of State to obtain modifications. Article eleventh provided, that a barrel of gunpowder should be given to the government of Tunis, for every gun fired in saluting American ships of war; and article twelfth, that "the subjects or citizens of the two nations shall be protected by the government, or commandants, of the places where they may be, and not by the other authorities of the country," and stipulated farther, that the government of Tunis might compel an American captain to put his vessel into its service, at such freight as the government itself should prescribe.

The Secretary of State instructed Messrs. O'Brien, Eaton, and Cathcart to procure, if possible, a change of the three articles in question into the following forms.

ARTICLE XI. — "When a vessel of war of one of the parties shall enter a port of the other, in which there is a fortification, she shall be saluted with fifteen guns; which salute the vessel of war shall return, gun for gun."

ARTICLE XII. — (First part as before.) — "The subjects and citizens of the two nations, respectively shall be protected in the places where they may be, by the officers of the government there existing; but, on failure of such protection, and for redress of every injury, the party may resort to the chief authority in each country, by whom adequate protection and complete justice shall be rendered."

"In case the government of Tunis shall have need of an American vessel for its service, such vessel being within the Regency, (and not previously engaged,) the government shall have the preference, on its paying the same freight as the Tunisian merchants usually pay for the same service, or at the like rate, if the service be without a customary precedent." The words in the parenthesis to be omitted, if objected to.

ARTICLE XIV. — "All vessels belonging to the citizens and inhabitants of the United States shall be permitted to enter the different ports of the kingdom of Tunis, and freely trade with the subjects and inhabitants thereof, on paying the usual duties that are paid by all other nations at peace with the Regency. In like manner all vessels belonging to the subjects and inhabitants of the kingdom of Tunis shall be permitted to enter the different ports of the United States, and freely trade with the citizens and inhabitants thereof, on paying the usual duties that are paid by all other nations at peace with the United States."

Or the following form, if preferred.

"The commerce of the citizens and inhabitants of the United States with the kingdom of Tunis, and of the subjects and inhabitants of the kingdom of Tunis with the United States, shall be on the footing of the most favored nations, for the time being respectively."

The Secretary instructed the American agents also to offer the Tunisian government a sum of money in lieu of the naval and military stores, stipulated to be delivered at Tunis, by the United States. The estimated value of these stores, at Tunis, was thirty-five thousand dollars. The agents were authorized to increase the sum to one hundred thousand dollars, if absolutely necessary. But if the delivery of the stores should be finally insisted on, and the alteration of the fourteenth article refused without an additional stipulation, they were to offer five thousand dollars in cash. If more should be required, and the alternative were an immediate war, they were instructed to go as far as ten thousand dollars. If this should be unsatisfactory, the matter was to be referred to the American government. They were further authorized to offer, instead of the present of naval and military stores, a cruiser, not exceeding twenty-two guns, six-pounders, either to be built for the purpose, or one already belonging to the United States.

If the agents found their efforts ineffectual to secure the continuance of peace, they were directed to keep the negotiation pending as long as possible, and to despatch letters to the Consul-General at Algiers, to the American consuls in all the ports of the Mediterranean sea, and to the ministers in Spain and Portugal, in order that effectual measures might be taken to secure American vessels from the perils of anticipated war.

The stipulations in M. Famin's treaty, whose objectionable character rendered this negotiation necessary, Mr. Barlow declared were not comprehended in the first project of the treaty transmitted to him in April ; and the insertion of the 14th article was accounted for on the ground, that M. Famin, being a merchant, might derive important advantages from a direct trade with the United States. The Bey and his government were probably led to agree to it, either in order to favor the project of the agent, or to make it the instrument of extorting new concessions from the government of the United States, who, they imagined, would be willing to pay an additional sum of money to have it expunged. The hostile attitude assumed by France towards the United States was well known to Famin, from M. Herculaïs, the principal agent of that nation in Barbary, by whom he was first recommended to Mr. Barlow. This circumstance might have rendered him a willing accomplice in thwarting the interests of the United States.

He had, however, been promised the American consulate at Tunis, by Mr. Barlow, if he succeeded in making a treaty with that power ; contrary to the policy adopted by our government, of appointing none but American citizens to that important office, in any of the Barbary States. But his influence with the Saptapa, or Keeper of the Seals, whose agent he was for all prizes brought in by that officer's corsairs, and his power to injure the interests of the United States, made it important to avoid giving him offence, and, if possible, to conciliate his friendship

To compensate, therefore, the disappointment he might feel in being superseded by the appointment of another, Eaton was authorized to offer him, on the part of the United States, for his services in negotiating, first a truce, and afterwards a treaty of peace, two thousand dollars, a sum equivalent to the consular salary for one year ; and to promise him, still further, a handsome present, in case of a successful issue to the final negotiation.

It has been already stated, that Eaton had his interview with the Bey on the 15th of March, being conducted to the palace and introduced by Famin. After the ceremony of delivering credentials, and kissing the hands of the Bey, coffee was brought in, and the conversation commenced. He began at once to complain, that he had not been informed that the American vessel was a vessel of war, that she might have received the customary salute ; and that the business of the agency had not been introduced to him by his ministers, without the intervention of a Jew ; and that the stipulated present of naval and military stores, though expected a year before, had not yet been delivered. To the first part of the complaint, the consul replied, that he was unacquainted with the custom ;* and to the last, that the treaty had been received by the American government only eight months before, when the plague was raging; and when that ceased, the winter had closed the harbors with ice; that all the means of the country were needed to defend her against the depredations of France, with whom she was at war; that the American government had objected to several stipulations in the treaty, and, when these should be altered, every exertion would be made to fulfil the obligations on their part.

The articles and amendments, above explained, were then pointed out to the Bey, and he was informed by the American agents, as a proof of the good faith of their government, that they were authorized to stipulate for the payment of an equivalent in cash. The Bey replied, in substance, that he had cash enough, and to spare; but that the stores were peculiarly necessary to him at this time, and that the United States had found no difficulty in fulfilling their engagements with Algiers and Tripoli. It was offered in explanation, that the American government had agreed to furnish the Dey of Algiers certain armed vessels, for which he was to pay cash; that no difficulty had been found in fulfilling this contract, because the vessels carried with them their own means of defence. He intimated a doubt, as well he might, of the Dey of Algiers having paid the cash, and abruptly asked M. Famin, why he had hoisted the colors of the United States, if the treaty had not been ratified. Though Famin declared he had received orders from the government, the American consuls assured the Bey that no such orders had been given, nor would be, until the ratification of the treaty, which would take place as soon as the few objectionable particulars had been adjusted, when despatches would be sent directly home, and the obligations of the American agent be at once acknowledged and paid. The Bey pettishly said, "It cost you but little to have your flag hoisted; it will cost you less to have it taken down," and insisted on the presents as a condition of peace. The consuls pointed out the danger of risking stores, which were contraband of war, in the Mediterranean, covered as it was with French and Spanish war-boats. They proposed, therefore, according to the instructions of the Department of State, to furnish the Bey with a cruiser, of equal value with the presents, provided he acceded to the required alterations in the treaty. Taking a hint from this proposition, the Bey declared, that he should expect an armed vessel gratuitously, when the business was settled. But he was promptly told to expect nothing of the kind; that the Americans had work enough for their navy in defending their commerce from the aggressions of France, and that it was only to prevent the loss of property in such a manner as would strengthen the hands of the common enemy, and to convince him of the honor of the American government, that the proposal had been made of substituting an armed vessel for the naval and military stores. Finding the occasion unfavorable to his views, the Bey postponed the discussion, and dismissed the consuls, with an injunction to make their communications to him directly, or through his ministers, and not through the medium of a Jew. A few moments after they had retired into the area of the palace, the Sapi-tapa informed them, that the Bey would receive them again on Monday.

On the 15th, Mr. Cathcart attempted to go on board the ship, for the purpose of departing to the place of his destination, but was detained at the Goletta all night. He was hospitably entertained by an old engineer, in the service of the Bey, who cautioned him not to trust in the honesty of Famin, and declared that all the foreign consuls regarded him as a spy, and that he was generally believed to have furnished the government of Tunis with pretexts for demands upon the tributary nations, for which he received a brokerage. These hints of the character of Famin coincided with the statements of the British consul.

The American agents had an interview with the plenipotentiary of Algiers, who offered them his friendship, advised them to move with caution and perseverance, and encouraged them to hope for a favorable issue of the negotiation. The government of Algiers exerted a commanding influence over the Regency of Tunis, by reason of its superiority in arms and resources; but it was neither safe nor prudent for any Christian nation to employ the mediation of Algiers in negotiations with Tunis, on account of the natural kindness existing between two kindred hordes of pirates. The Americans, therefore, were not forward to enter into confidential relations with the Algerine diplomatist, and contented themselves with a statement of the general bearing of their affairs.

On the 18th, another interview was held with the Bey, at which the objectionable articles and the proposed amendments were laid before him. He said, that he was not tenacious of the article in its present shape, and was willing to alter the duty to six, ten, or an hundred per cent, provided the United States would make it reciprocal and demand no partial privileges. The substitute, before cited, to the effect that the commercial intercourse between Tunis and the United States should be on the footing of the most favored nation, respectively, was proposed. The Bey replied, that he could not agree to this, until he knew what the duties paid in the United States were. In his ports the duties paid by the most favored nations were three per cent ad valorem, by a valuation taken in 1753; and many articles had risen six hundred per cent in value since that time. This arrangement had been fixed by a treaty with France, and had been adopted as a rule for other nations. But the proposed substitute might expose his subjects to the payment of any duty the government of the United States saw fit to impose, with the single restriction, that it should not exceed the duties paid by the most favored nation. He therefore proposed to fix the duty at ten per cent, respectively, his subjects having the liberty of carrying their merchandise under any colors whatever. The proposition, however, was inadmissible, and the further consideration of the article was postponed to the next day.

The first clause of the amendment to the twelfth article was then introduced and no objection was offered to it by the Bey. The second clause in the same article, the Bey declared had been misconstrued or badly translated from the original ; that it was intended to apply to cases of emergency only, when he had occasion to send vessels to the Levant, or other ports in the Mediterranean, but was not meant to extend to vessels of war or of the government. He was told, that the demand, even with this explanation, was not conceded to any nation on earth. It was not reciprocal ; and would injure both the American commerce and his own, by turning American merchantmen from their course, and by deterring the vessels from his ports. The following modification was proposed ; “ If, in case of emergency the government of Tunis should have need of an American vessel to facilitate despatches to any port in the Mediterranean, such vessel being within the Regency, and not a vessel of war, nor belonging to the government of the United States, may be compelled to perform such service, on receiving a payment sufficient to indemnify the owners and others concerned for such service and detention.” This was agreed to ; and the Bey passed to the delay of the United States in forwarding the presents. The reasons for this delay were re-stated, and the obstacles, interposed by the constitution of the United States were explained. The compact was not complete, because the Senate had not ratified it, and therefore the government were neither obliged nor authorized to forward the presents ; no provision would be made for this purpose, until the treaty should be amended and ratified, at which time the government would promptly fulfil all their engagements.

After a moment's pause, the Bey replied, “ To-morrow ! you have stayed till my dinner is getting cold ; come to-morrow at eleven o'clock.”

Another interview was accordingly held on the 19th, at the palace. The Bey touched upon the twelfth article again, and ordered his secretary to insert his explanation of the first clause in the original ; but he pretended, that he did not mean to have the second altered, according to the understanding of the Americans, and ordered his secretary to alter the original, so that it should not be limited to couriers in case of emergency, but might extend to the freight of a merchant vessel, when a cargo was to be sent to, or brought from, any port in the Mediterranean. It was replied, that, if the alteration should be confined to couriers in cases of emergency, and for the immediate service of the government, the United States might possibly consent to it, but never would in its present form, or, if they should, American merchantmen would never enter his ports. The Bey affected great indifference in his reply, and declared, that the United States might reject it, or send it back, if they did not like it in its present form.

He then resumed the consideration of the fourteenth article, repeated what he had said the day before, and strongly urged the definite settlement of the duty, agreeing to a reciprocity. He was told, that the duties could not be exactly defined, because the power of laying duties on imports was vested in the Congress of the United States. The substituted article allowed him the privileges which were granted to the best friends of the country, and permitted him to impose on American goods the same duties, that he imposed on those of the most favored nations. It was positively declared, that the article must be altered, or the negotiation was at an end, and the expectation of presents must be abandoned. Turning to the eleventh article, he inquired what alteration was demanded in that. "Strike out the barrel of powder for each gun, and reduce the number to fifteen." This he declined, but offered to render the terms of the article reciprocal by imposing the same duty on Tunisian vessels in American ports.

As this was already implied by the phrasing of the translation, he was told, that they would not agree to it, that although the expense would be but trifling, the demand was humiliating to us and not very honorable to him. "However trifling," was his reply, "it may appear to you, to me it is important. Fifteen barrels of powder will furnish a cruiser, which may capture a prize and net me one hundred thousand dollars." He was told, that both justice and honor would forbid the United States acceding to the demand. "You consult your honor," said he, "I my interest ; but, if you wish to save your honor in this instance, give me fifty barrels of powder annually, and I will consent to the alteration." This proposition was promptly and peremptorily declined. Upon which, turning to the Sapitapa, he said, "These people are Cheribeenas ;* they are so hard, there is no dealing with them." It was urged, that the United States had made great sacrifices to obtain a peace, which was likely to be useless. The grasping barbarian replied, that friends usually made good their professions by something better than words; but he was answered, that friendship was reciprocal, and, in business of this nature, was wholly out of the question; that, in equity, he would find it hard to justify his claims upon those who had never injured him, and who had been treated as enemies, though they had never been at war with him. "You will be pleased to consider, also, that you have never been at peace; and if it be no favor to have a free navigation into the Mediterranean, why do you ask it?" It was proposed to expunge the eleventh article altogether. He agreed that it should be done, and that no salute should be fired without being demanded; upon which he rose, without ceremony, and, as he was leaving the apartment, he was asked, if he had resolved upon any thing respecting the fourteenth article. "I'll think of it," said he; "there are other people to be consulted. You will call the day after to-morrow."

After the Bey's departure, the Sapitapa suggested to Mr. Cathcart, that the Bey might be induced to alter the article by a private present, but that the article relative to the powder must stand. Upon consulting a few moments, the agents replied, that a gratuity might be expected on the successful issue of the negotiation, but no stipulation to that effect would be made ; that the United States had formed a good opinion of the ability and integrity of the Bey of Tunis, and it was hoped the opinion would be confirmed ; that his influence would probably have great weight with the Bey, and any friendly offices he might render would not be forgotten. He replied, to the intent, that he was favorably disposed to the American cause, and whatever influence he possessed, should be at their service.

On Thursday, the 21st, the American agents attended at the palace again, but no interview was held, as the Bey was engaged with letters from the East. On the following day, however, the subject was again taken up, and the Bey, reverting to the fourteenth article, reiterated his proposition to establish the duty at ten, twenty, or even one hundred per cent, ad valorem ; or, if they could inform him what duties were paid by other nations in American ports, he would determine whether the interests of his subjects would permit him to receive their terms. He was answered, that the duties paid in America were various and fluctuating, and that any further discussion on this point would be a useless waste of time. The proposition made by them was, to place the Tunisians on the same ground, as to commercial privileges, with the most favored nations for the time being ; and, as the Tunisian merchants would rarely if ever send goods to America, the terms which he urged, could not be of much importance to him or his subjects. But the Bey assured them, that, as mankind were becoming more enlightened, he hoped he should send many vessels there before long. It was still insisted, that the Tunisians should not be admitted to privileges not granted to any other nation, even at the risk of war. The Bey was asked, if any inducement would prevail on him to make the proposed alterations in the treaty; to which he replied in the negative, and proposed a substitute, to the effect, that the citizens of the United States should have liberty to enter the ports of Tunis on condition of paying a duty equal to that paid by Tunisian traders to the United States; nine months being allowed to obtain the necessary information, and three per cent only being paid in the mean time; and that the subjects of the kingdom of Tunis should be admitted to the ports of the United States, on paying the duty usually paid by the most favored nation.

The eleventh article, prescribing the conditions of a mutual salute, was again discussed, and the following terms were finally agreed upon; "When a vessel of war of one of the parties shall enter a port of the other, and demand to be saluted, there shall be paid one barrel of powder for each gun demanded for the salute; but, if the demand be not made by the consul on the part of the United States, or by the commandant of the vessel on the part of the kingdom of Tunis, no salute shall be given, nor payment demanded for the salute.”

It was proposed to send a cruiser instead of the stipulated stores. The Bey replied, that one cruiser was not enough, and that it would be a very good thing to compliment him with a cruiser in addition to the stipulated presents. This was of course declined; and the commissioners withdrew to the apartment of the Sapitapa, to have the alterations now agreed upon inserted in the original. The occasion was seized by the Sapitapa, to demand a present for the Bey; the demand gave rise to a little sharp-shooting, in which the agents had the best of the argument, but the Sapitapa showed the most passion. They separated, and the next Monday was appointed for another interview. This, however, did not take place until Tuesday, when the Sapitapa renewed his demand of a present for the Bey. It was evaded on the plea, that Americans were not admitted to the privileges of all other nations, and ought not therefore to be subjected to the same usages, and no proposition of this kind would be admitted. But Famin pretended to have a letter of Mr. Barlow's, instructing him to make provision for this demand. The fact was denied, and the letter was not produced; on the contrary, it was declared, that the American government would never yield to the demand. "Then," exclaimed the Sapitapa, "you may write to your government, that you have a truce, but not a peace, with Tunis." An angry controversy followed, which ended in an agreement to send home to the American government a note, drawn up by the Sapitapa, containing an invoice of the articles furnished by Spain on a similar occasion, with the assurance, however, that no notice would be taken of it.

On the 27th a note was received from the secretary, dictated by the Sapitapa, insisting upon the payment of the claim, on the alteration of the treaty. Eaton answered it on the 29th, requesting to know, what the presents were, which were usually given on such occasions to the Keeper of the Seal and the secretary, and alleging, that the treaty could not be considered complete until now, and that the presents already given were in anticipation of this event. The letter went on to declare, that the consul would not govern his conduct by Spanish precedents, but perhaps the United States might be enabled to adopt the usages of the Danes and Swedes.

The secretary replied, a day or two after, that the treaty had been changed by altering and retrenching some of the articles, and therefore the customary presents would be required. The Bey insisted upon receiving not only a gratuity, according to the memorandum previously copied, but something a "little better"; and they were informed, that if these terms dissatisfied them, the Bey would see them at his palace, and communicate something more precise for the American government.

CHAPTER V

Negotiation continued. — Influence of England. — Presents demanded by the Bey. — Statement of the Articles required. — President's Letter to the Bey. — Difficulties removed, and an Accommodation effected.

MR. CATHCART sailed on the 2d of April, 1799, for Tripoli, leaving Eaton to conduct the negotiation in future alone. On the same day, he waited upon the Bey, with additional presents, to be divided between him and the Sapitapa; the Bey still insisted upon the present, but was told, that his demand could not be acceded to, and that the government of the United States must be consulted. "If you will not agree to it," said he, "you may go home, and consider void all that has been done." Eaton replied, that he would go, if there was no other alternative. "Very well," said he, "I give you ten days to consider the subject; and, if you continue in your present resolution, you may embark in the brig, on her return from Tripoli, and go home." Eaton assented, and the Bey left the chamber in a rage. The conversation was continued with the Sapitapa, who asked if the articles were not manufactured in America, and if America was not an old country. The answer in the negative surprised the learned minister; but he cut the difficulty short, by saying, "The Bey must have his present; it is indispensable." Eaton urged the minister to use his influence with the Bey, in persuading him not to insist on a present, which it would be impossible to procure, and which would leave no alternative but war. As he left the court, he was beset by the clamorous demands of the under officers and principal slaves of the palace, for money, "according to the usages of all other nations," on the reception of a new consul.

The next day, the consul waited on the prime minister, and had another interview with the Sapidapa, whom he found in better temper than on the preceding day. He pressed upon him, however, that the Bey had been led to expect something handsome, in case of admitting the alteration; but, the alteration being acceded to, the implied promise seemed to be forgotten. The consul replied, that the Bey must have mistaken his meaning, or his meaning had not been intelligibly expressed; that his letter went no farther than to assure him, that the United States would not follow the example of Spain, and for the best of reasons, because they could not; that gold and diamonds were not to be had in America, nor anybody to work them. "What are you?" said the Sapitapa, "a parcel of countrymen, shepherds, and rustics?" "Very much so." "But you build ships?" "Yes." "Well, suppose you agree to make the Bey a present of a small, handsome cruiser?" Eaton consented to consider this proposition, in the ten days that the Bey had given him to deliberate on the first, and the Sapitapa promised to use his best endeavors to facilitate the measure.

The following remarks, suggested by the preceding negotiations, are copied from Eaton's journal.

"It is hard to negotiate, where the terms are wholly ex parte. The Barbary courts are indulged in the habit of dictating their own terms of negotiation. Even the English, as the consul himself informed me, on his arrival and reception here, had furnished him a present in cash and other articles, valued in England at seventeen thousand pounds sterling. But Tunis trembles at the voice of England. This, then, must be a political intrigue of England, to embarrass the other mercantile Christian nations; and it has the effect. To the United States, they believe they can dictate terms. Why should they not? Or why should they believe it will ever be otherwise? They have seen nothing in America to controvert this opinion. And all our talk of resistance and reprisal, they view as the swagger-mg of a braggadocio. They are at present seriously concerned, through fear that the English and Americans are in offensive and defensive alliance. The report is current, and I have taken occasion to cherish it, by being seen frequently with the British consul, dining with him, and holding secret intercourse. But, whatever stratagem may be used to aid our measures, it is certain, that there is no access to the permanent friendship of these States, without paving the way with gold or cannon balls; and the proper question is, Which method is preferable? So long as they hold their own terms, no estimate can be made of the expense of maintaining a peace. They are under no restraint of honor or honesty. There is not a scoundrel among them, from the prince to the muleteer, who will not beg and steal. Yet when I proposed to the Sapitapa, to-day, to substitute money in lieu of the present, he said the Bey had too high a sense of honor to receive a bribe; he would receive a present, but it would affront him to offer him money."

How far these strictures were justified by facts, the reader can judge from the statements in the foregoing pages, and a few specimens of Tunisian assurance, like the following. On the 6th, old Mustapha Coggia returned the present Eaton had sent him, with a message, that he was not accustomed to receive presents of lower value than those given to the Sapitapa, who was inferior to him in rank, being second minister. The venerable statesman was represented as excessively angry, but it was intimated, that some small additions would soothe his passion, and make every thing right. The next day, the admiral entered a claim for a gold-headed cane, a gold watch and chain, and twelve pieces of cloth. The Aga of the Goletta, also, demanded the usance for the first vessel of war coming to anchor in the bay. These are a small specimen of the vexatious extortions to which the American consul was perpetually subjected.

An interview was held at the palace on the 14th. The consul was informed, that the Bey had declined the proposal of a cruiser in lieu of the present in jewels; upon which he again suggested a payment in cash, and offered a round sum of fifty thousand dollars in full of all demands. But the Sapitapa answered, that the maritime and military presents were very rich, and peculiarly necessary at this time; and if two hundred and fifty thousand dollars were to be offered, the Bey would decline it. Eaton recapitulated the arguments against the justice of the demand, and urged again the impossibility of procuring the articles. The Sapitapa declared, that the Bey must have the present at any rate, and, as to himself, he must be complimented with a double-barrelled gun and a gold watch-chain. Such impudence naturally enough provoked the consul's somewhat irascible temper. He told the diplomatic beggar, that the United States would find it cheaper, and better policy, to send a force into those seas to defend their commerce, than to yield to these accumulated demands. The minister reported to the Bey, and the consul was introduced to his apartment. The Bey got into a passion, and rose to leave the hall; but, before he went out, turned to Eaton, and said, "Consult your government. I give them six months to give me an answer, and to send the presents. If they come in that time, well; if not, take down your flag, and go home."

In a letter, dated July 15th, 1799, addressed to the Secretary of State, Eaton writes, "I have yet mentioned nothing of further attempts at a cash payment in lieu of the maritime and military stores, because no well grounded hopes were entertained of success, and because the results of projects some time since in operation were not known.

"Interest was making with the governor of Porto Farina and the Sapitapa, to influence the Bey into the measure, and the prospect was considered not wholly desperate, though not flattering. I had assured the Sapitapa, that if he would procure a final settlement and discharge of all demands, for any sum short of ninety thousand dollars, he should be entitled to receive ten thousand dollars, promptly, in consideration of his good offices. He seemed much inclined to the argument."

"On the 28th ult., he gave a dinner at his garden." — "In the morning of this day, I took the opportunity to obtain his decided opinion relative to the cash substitute. He gave it, that the project was not feasible; said that the Bey had purchased, and was purchasing, all the ammunition he could procure; that he had sent vessels to Trieste, Mahon, and Spain, for maritime and military stores, such as he expected from America, without being able to procure them. That he was sending to Gibraltar and England with the same views; that the delinquency of the United States had occasioned great disappointment; particularly so at the present crisis. It had operated to retard, and indeed to defeat, plans of national defence and enterprise, the entire execution of which depended on these munitions of war. He was authorized again to declare, that no sum of money would be considered equivalent to the presents. He hoped, if the timber could not be procured immediately, (for I told him it was yet growing on the sources of our rivers,) that the guns, ammunition, pitch, tar, rosin, cordage, and such other articles as are to be found in our magazines, would be forwarded without delay.

“It is worthy of remark here, that, while we were at dinner, a body of Turks came armed to the garden, and even into the court-yard, and demanded money, alleging that the government, having made peace with everybody, had reduced them to famine; but they were resolved not to starve. This circumstance confirms the opinion heretofore advanced, ‘that they must be let loose upon somebody.’”

About this time, the Portuguese and Sicilian ambassadors left Tunis, each having concluded a truce with the Bey's government. This was an additional cause of alarm to the consul, and led him to a renewed effort to bring about a payment in cash. Accordingly, on the 4th of July, he waited on the Bey, and requested him to state what sum would satisfy his claims, and cancel his demands. “No sum whatever; you need not think more of it;” was the sharp reply. The result of this interview was such, that Eaton considered the ultimatum which he had been instructed to propose, as finally rejected. He became convinced, that the commerce of the United States was marked out as the victim of Tunisian piracy.

At the end of July, the Bey had the insolence to call on the consuls of the tributary nations residing at his court, including the American, and demanded immediate supplies of naval stores. He required of the American consul to charter a ship to bring out the American contribution without delay. After wasting three days at the palace, in discussion of this reiterated demand, the matter was dropped. The Bey was prevailed upon to wait until the first of January "I have uniformly found the Bey," says Eaton, "a reasonable and accommodating man. But the Sapitapa owns corsairs, and Famin is his slave!"

A further attempt was made, early in October, to persuade the Bey to receive ten thousand dollars' worth of such articles as he might choose, from England, in place of the jewels, but without success. He answered, that "he was not a merchant; he knew nothing of the value of the presents; they were the usance, and he should neither abate nor commute." Such being the condition of affairs, the consul thought it prudent to caution the other American consuls in the Mediterranean.

Considering it necessary to communicate information of the existing state of affairs to the government at home, Eaton determined to send Dr. Shaw, of the brig Sophia, with despatches. He was accordingly directed to hold himself in readiness, as early as the 12th of October, to proceed to England, and consult with Rufus King, the American minister at the court of St. James; to deliver him a memorandum of the jewels demanded by the Bey, and take his instructions on the mode of procuring them at the lowest price ; to carry a specific memorandum of the same to the United States, and to transmit a copy to the consul at Tunis. With these instructions, Dr. Shaw was ordered to proceed, with all convenient speed, to Philadelphia, the seat of government. This measure received the approbation of the consul-general at Algiers.

It may not be amiss to quote here a statement of the articles of military and maritime stores, stipulated in the treaty to be delivered to the Regency of Tunis. The document has a singular appearance in these days ; but we must be content with the poor consolation, that other and more powerful nations submitted to terms even more humiliating. Here is the list ;

More than one hundred thousand dollars had been already expended in the negotiations with Tunis, but peace was not yet secured; and the above stipulated presents, with the Bey's extraordinary demands, would amount to nearly two hundred thousand dollars more. With good reason did Eaton urge, that the mode of treating with the Barbary regencies ought to be so reformed as to remove the impression, that weakness and fear had dictated the measures hitherto adopted by the United States. In his correspondence with the consuls at Algiers and Tripoli, this subject is adverted to with frequency and force; and his representations to the government at home abound with views, at once manly and judicious. The history of the subsequent intercourse between the United States and the Barbary powers confirms the truth of his predictions, and the soundness of his arguments, in every particular.

The measure of sending Dr. Shaw home had a beneficial effect upon the dispositions of the Bey's government. It was regarded as a proof of a sincere intention to fulfil the stipulations of the treaty; the influence of which Eaton had occasion to observe at the next interview with the Sapitapa. In a letter to Shaw, dated November 4th, he says, the Sapitapa "went into an explication of the causes which had produced in this court unaccommodating dispositions towards the government of the United States; the principal of which was, an attempt to impose a treaty through the medium of Algiers. He said it was an indignity offered to the Bey, which no other Christian power had ever offered, and it was a result as ineffectual as it was unprecedented. I answered him, that the government of the United States, unacquainted with the true relation, which this Regency held with that of Algiers, had been seduced into that error by the intrigue of an influential Jew house at Algiers; but, when convinced of the error, they had reformed their mode of negotiation; the Bey would never again have occasion to imagine himself insulted from that quarter. We had some explanations that were personal, as they respected himself. The result of all which was, expressions of mutual confidence, and a tender of reciprocal services. As a pledge of his sincerity, he offered to procure me a *tiskery for as much wheat as I pleased to ship."

Another cause of this change was the Bey's belief, that the Americans would send a fleet into the Mediterranean, as soon as a peace should be concluded with France. The private interest of the Sapitapa was also turned to account. He saw that the Americans would be his safest carriers to Spain, where he had opened an extensive commerce, the ships of other nations being exposed to the depredations of the belligerent powers of Europe, or the Algerine corsairs. Eaton told him, that, during his residence at Tunis, propositions had been sent to him by the American consul at Leghorn and Barcelona, and by two American shipmasters, to introduce a trade there; but that, since they had been informed of the articles of the treaty, nothing further had been heard from them. He was assured, that no American merchantman would voluntarily enter a Tunisian port under the present provisions of the treaty. The Sapitapa felt the force of these observations, and promised his influence with the Bey, to bring about a more satisfactory arrangement of affairs with America. The Bey also promised forbearance for sixty days, in spite of Famin's attempts to convince him, that the government of the United States had no intention of fulfilling their engagements with Tunis. The consul, therefore, had, at this moment, a flattering prospect of terminating the negotiation with Tunis, in a manner favorable to the interests of the United States, and conformable to instructions of the government.

On the 27th of December, Eaton received information, through Mr. O'Brien, that the frigates United States and Constitution would probably bring out the articles intended for the Regencies, which he immediately communicated to the Bey, with an assurance that they would probably arrive in January. January came, but did not bring the promised presents. The consul was compelled to use all his diplomatic skill to soothe the Bey under this unexpected and unfortunate disappointment. He found it a matter of some difficulty, and requiring considerable address; for the spring was at hand, and the corsairs were waiting impatiently to be let loose upon their prey. Many American merchantmen were at anchor in the port of Leghorn; and intelligence had arrived, through that city, of General Washington's death. These and other particulars were communicated by Famin to the minister; and the impression very naturally made upon the Bey was, that the United States had violated their pledges, for ships might as well be sent to Tunis as to Leghorn. The prospect of a speedy adjustment again became overclouded.

On the 24th of March, 1800, Mr. Eaton received by the Sophia a communication from the Secretary of State, with a letter from the President to the Bey. The Secretary's letter contained a few instructions in reference to the Bey's demand of jewels. Eaton was directed to use every effort to do away with the claim, or reduce it to the lowest possible amount, but if the presents were necessary to preserve the peace with Tunis, he must obtain time enough to get them from England, where they might be procured for much less than the estimated sum. The President's letter was made up of compliments and apologies; compliments to the Bey for his attentions to Mr. Eaton and Mr. Cathcart, and apologies for the failure to deliver the stipulated stores at the required time. But the Bey was assured, that the stipulations of the United States should be fulfilled, as early as the great distance of the country, and the time necessary to procure the stores, rendered it practicable.

When these letters arrived, the Bey was just recovering from a dangerous illness. The consul immediately repaired to the palace, was admitted to an audience, and, having passed the usual formalities, withdrew to the apartment of the Saptapa. He stated the arrival of news from the United States, and desired to know when he might make a formal communication to the Bey. "Do you take us for dupes?" he exclaimed. "You have at one time showed us letters from your minister at Portugal, at another from your consul-general at Algiers; at another from your consul at Leghorn. At one period your presents were under convoy of two frigates; at another in quarantine at Lisbon; and then we are placed at our windows with our spy-glasses, looking for the arrival of vessels which sail in air. We are no longer to be amused. It is not necessary that you take the trouble of a formal communication. I now candidly inform you, (a measure which has long since been resolved on,) that the corsairs now bound on a cruise, have orders to bring in Americans; and for this purpose, they are ordered to cruise off the coast of Spain and Portugal." The consul's explanations were impatiently interrupted by the Sapitapa's assurance that they were needless, the measure having already been fully resolved upon. The consul persisted. He informed the Sapitapa, that he had already placed his countrymen on their guard against this event; that American merchantmen were well armed, and would defend themselves. The Sapitapa's attention was aroused, and the consul took advantage of the change to proceed with his explanation, that the communications heretofore made were unofficial, and founded on letters from ministers and consuls, whose anxiety for their country's peace had led them to place too much reliance upon inaccurate information. The present communication was direct from the American government, and included a letter from the President, written by his own hand, to the Bey, with the treaty ratified, and with assurances that a large ship was ready, laden with naval and military stores, and that he was, moreover, authorized to meet the demand of the Bey for jewels, in a way which would probably be satisfactory. "It is very well! This looks a little more like truth," said the minister, "but will not arrest the cruise. If we make captures of Americans we will send the Christians (meaning the crews) to your house; your vessels to Porto Farina; and their cargoes we will safely store. They shall be held in sequestration a given number of days, in expectation of the arrival of your presents so much talked about; on failure of which they shall be good prize."

It was answered, that a step of this kind would defeat its own object. The Americans would never yield without resistance, and bloodshed would be the inevitable consequence of making the attempt. To prevent, therefore, the evils that would certainly result from this project, the Bey ought to see the President's letter, and hear the communication. The minister finally said, he would see the Bey the next day, and appointed the day succeeding that for another conference.

On the appointed day, the consul made the above communications to the Bey. He was flattered by the President's letter, thanked God, and expressed his hope for the safe arrival of the ship; but observed that nothing was said about the jewels. The consul replied, that he had been directed to procure a present of this kind from England, but that the sum had been limited much within the estimated value of the jewels. "To me," said the Bey, "the sum limited is of no import. I shall be satisfied, provided the articles come according to the note."

The difficulties, which had threatened the peace of the United States for the last five months, were at last accommodated. The Sapidapa pledged himself, that the last clause of the twelfth article in the treaty, inserted by Famin, should be forever suspended, except so far as the customs of all other nations at peace with Tunis had conferred on the Bey's government the right of exacting services on special emergencies, and that the flag of the United States should be respected in all the ports of the kingdom. This agreeable intelligence was immediately communicated by a circular, addressed to the American consuls in the ports of the Mediterranean. For his services in managing these affairs, Eaton received the approbation of the President of the United States, and warm expressions of friendship from Mr. Pickering.

CHAPTER VI.

Arrival of the Hero with Stores. — Apprehensions of War with Tunis removed. — Fraudulent Conduct of the Bey. — Eaton takes Charge of the Danish Affairs at Tunis. — His disinterested Conduct in Relation to the Danish Vessels. — Letter of the Danish Admiral in Relation to it. — Eaton's Quarrel with Famin. — Chastises him publicly, and is summoned before the Bey. — Defends himself and denounces Famin. — Arrival of the Anna Maria with Stores, and her Detention in the Service of the Bey.

ON the 12th of April, 1800, the ship Hero, Captain Robinson, arrived at Tunis and anchored at the Goletta. She brought a portion of the stipulated naval and military stores, to be delivered to the Bey's government. They consisted of tar, rosin, pitch, turpentine, cordage, cables, planks, masts, hawsers, and shot. The ship was unmanageable and weakly manned, "with just guns enough to give the signal of distress"; but the stores were of a quality superior to any thing that had heretofore been seen in Tunis. This arrival relieved Mr. Eaton from many embarrassments, and took away all ground of apprehension, for the present, of war. How strong these apprehensions were, is fully indicated in the consul's letters. "I consider," he says to Mr. O'Brien, "old Robinson as the Mordecai of our nation; and it is owing to his perseverance that we shall escape the misery and shame of all being slaves to these miniature Indians. In less than six months we should have had more than a hundred of our fellow-citizens slaves here." Various obstacles prevented her from discharging the cargo, until twenty days after the regular time, for which her owners were entitled by contract to fifty dollars per day, amounting to one thousand dollars. This part of the contract gave the Bey an opportunity of practising an amusing fraud. The stores were intended to be paid for, and a promise to that effect was given by the governor at Porto Farina. They were, accordingly, unloaded and stored away. The Bey declined paying, but gave permission to take them back. As this would have detained the ship some twenty days more, with no means but her own, the stores were of course left in the keeping of the officers of the Bey's government.

The warlike dispositions of the Tunisians being diverted from the United States, by the partial fulfilment of the treaty stipulations, fixed upon Denmark. In 1797, the Bey had demanded a large supply of naval and military stores from his friend, the Danish monarch, whom he allowed six months to comply with the requisition. The King was not sufficiently prompt in executing this commission. He sent a ship laden with timber, in 1798; but it was so far from meeting the Bey's expectations, that he rejected the cargo, even after it was unladen, and the articles, of which it was composed, were left to perish. The Bey's thoughts had been withdrawn from the Danes by his projects against the Americans. The arrival of the Hero had put a stop to his designs in that quarter, and the corsairs were accordingly let loose upon the commerce of Denmark. A Danish merchantman from Leghorn arrived soon after at the Goletta, unsuspecting of danger, information of which was immediately communicated by Famin, and the master and crew were arrested before they could make their escape. Another Danish ship, laden with coffee, sugar, and other West India produce, was sent into Biserta on the same day. In consequence of these events, the Danish consul-general, Mr. Hammekin, expecting to be compelled to leave the kingdom, solicited Eaton to take charge of the Danish affairs. As there were no rival interests between the two nations, the proposition was readily acceded to. On the 28th of June, the Danish flagstaff was cut down, and war was declared by the Bey against the King of Denmark; more than seventy Danes were condemned to slavery, and the consul was confined to his house. A few days afterwards, he and his family were ordered to quit the kingdom of Tunis. The minister of the Bey detailed to Eaton the causes of the war, and attempted to show that the Danes were the aggressors. His argument was, "that the Bey had a right to demand presents, and that the King of Denmark had violated his good faith by treating that demand contemptuously." He confessed, in conversation, that the war was intended against the Americans; but the letter from the President had suspended the operation for a reasonable time, to wait the arrival of the ship. He acknowledged, that they had never received articles of so excellent a quality from any Christian nation. "I remarked to him," says Eaton, "that, if he had given me the credit which he was now convinced he ought, he might have saved himself and the Bey much impatience, and the entire trouble of arming his navy against us; but I had observed with some concern, that he chose rather to hear meddling fellows, who would as deliberately betray him as me, if the occasion suited." "That is past," said he, "and you have had your own way of revenge. We are convinced you have dealt candidly with us, though we sometimes thought you a little hard-bitted; but you are a sort of Englishmen, you Americans, are you not?" "We are not Italians." "Have you no

Pope in America?" "Yes; once a year our boys and girls of the streets, accompanied by our sailors and fiddlers, make a Pope and a Devil of old cast clothes, mount them both on a borrico (jackass), and, after driving them about till they are wearied, tar and feather and burn them together, by way of amusement." He laughed heartily, and said, "I believe you are just such another hard-headed race as the English; but, thank God, we are friends."

The Bey, by way of expressing his satisfaction, offered Eaton a house at Biserta, by the seaside, in which he might pass the summer. As early as the 16th of July, eight Danish vessels had been captured, and about one hundred men reduced to slavery. The estimated value of the ships and cargoes, together with the slaves, was four hundred and eleven thousand Spanish dollars. The masters of six of the captured vessels had desired Eaton to redeem their property, giving him to understand that they could open a credit in Leghorn. He went to the minister, and proposed to purchase the vessels in his own name. The proposition was accepted, and an agent appointed. Eaton examined the vessels, and made an offer. During the time taken by the minister to consider it, the Danish captains were alarmed into giving up the project. The consul's only hope now depended on the refusal of the government to accept his terms. He was overbid by Famin ; but this proved to be only a ruse to extort a higher offer ; for a messenger arrived the next day at Biserta to declare the astonishment of the government at his departure, because their agent had received orders to close with his proposal. He returned immediately, concluded the bargain, and fixed on the mode of payment ; but the Danish captains failed to fulfil their promises, and Eaton was left with six vessels, purchased on credit. An opportunity was now offered him of realizing a handsome sum by a perfectly fair and honorable speculation, with property which had been forced, against his will, upon his hands ; but, when the difficulties with Denmark were adjusted by the sacrifice, on the part of that power, of eight vessels and cargoes and sixty-one thousand four hundred and forty Spanish dollars, for the redemption of eighty-six captives, Eaton surrendered the vessels in his possession to their respective masters, simply on the condition of his credit with the government being redeemed, and his actual disbursements repaid. This was an act of disinterested generosity which received the acknowledgment of the Danish admiral on the spot, and, subsequently, more ample and emphatic expressions of gratitude from the monarch himself, through the medium of the "Board of Affairs relating to the States on the Coast of Barbary." The following extract from their letter to Eaton is equally honorable to both parties.

“His Majesty the King, having been informed of your kind proceeding towards his subjects, who last year had the misfortune of being made slaves by the Tunisians; as also of the service you have rendered the owners of six of the captured ships, by venturing to purchase them, at the instance of the masters, and restoring them since to the said owners, though upon a somewhat precarious security of getting reimbursed your expenses; and of the friendly assistance which you have lent Commodore Koefoed, as he addressed himself to you; has been most graciously pleased to order us to transmit to you the gold box, ornamented with the initials of his royal name, which will be delivered to you along with this letter, and which you will please to accept, as a token of his most high satisfaction with regard to the services you have rendered the nation.”

The letter was replied to in suitable terms by the consul, and transmitted forthwith to the Department of State.

The intercourse between Eaton and the former American consul was not very cordial, as may be conjectured from expressions in his journals and letters, heretofore cited. About this time, it came to a sudden and violent conclusion, in a manner characteristic both of the faults and the excellences of Eaton's temperament. Finding himself often thwarted by the intrigues of Famin, and irritated by personal insults, he gave him, on occasion of an accidental meeting, a severe castigation with a horsewhip. Famin summoned him before the tribunal; but Eaton, nowise intimidated by the apprehension of summary proceedings, met him there, and boldly denounced him as a traitor and a villain; declaring, that he did not present himself there to answer the allegations of the traitor, but to denounce him as such, and to withdraw from him that protection which he had never merited, but had shamefully dishonored.

"I will send you out of the country," said the Bey. "You will do me an honor, which I will take care to appreciate." "How dare you lift your hand against a subject of mine in my kingdom?" "If your renegade had been in the kingdom of heaven, and had given me the same provocation, I would have given him the same discipline. But the Bey of Tunis has too much penetration to believe that abject wretch faithful even to his patron. If he were such, if he were a true Frenchman, I would respect him as such; if an American, I would protect him as such; if a good Mussulman, I would honor him as such; or, if a Christian, he should be duly respected. He is neither one nor the other. I have documents to convince you, that he would sell your head for caroubes, and barter away the reputation of your court for piastres. See here his statement to an American, who, by this means, has been entrapped into his hands. Hear him call your prime minister and his mercantile agents a set of thieves and robbers." "How!" "Yes, thieves and robbers!"

"Mercy! Forbearance!" cried Famin.

"Yes, thieves and robbers! This is the man of your confidence! This is the man of mediation between your Excellency and my master, the President; and these are the measures he uses to maintain the good understanding subsisting between us. Had he been faithful, either in his representations of your Excellency's character to the President, or in that of my nation to you, you would long since have received, whatever they might have been, the presents stipulated as tokens of friendship. It is his treachery, his falsehood, his sleek and plausible misrepresentations, which have generated the misintelligence between us. Do not suppose I am ignorant of his intrigues. Full well I know, he labored three days, incessantly, after my arrival at Biserta, to prevail on your Excellency to refuse me an audience. Full well I know, that, during our negotiation, he was playing a double game with us. And full well I know, that he has uniformly insinuated, that my government were flattering you with delusive expectations and insincere promises, and that I myself am sent here to be the instrument of this hypocrisy."

"But how do you know these things? Whatever passed between him and me on these subjects, was tête-à-tête."

"Yes, but the fellow had not prudence enough to keep your confidence. Elated with the prospect of success, he blabbed every thing to the woman he keeps; she to her neighbors; so that it has been the topic of conversation in half the Christian taverns in Tunis, 'that his Excellency the Bey was going to send away the American consul' to accommodate an apostate Frenchman! as if the Bey of Tunis had not independence of mind, nor discernment to discriminate between the event of insulting a nation and disobliging a slave. Permit me to suggest to your Excellency, your reputation has been brought into disrespect in the event." The Bey listened. Famin was alarmed, and began an address in Arabic. "Speak French," said the Bey, looking at him frowningly. He denied Eaton's charges; but facts were brought in evidence, which convinced the Bey, who gave Eaton's hand a cordial pressure on parting, and said to his court, "The American consul has been heated; but truly he has had reason. I have always found him a very plain, candid man; and his concern for his fellow-citizens is not a crime."

A letter dated November 1st, 1800, addressed to the Secretary of State, gives the following account of further discussions with the Bey, relative to the presents.

“I was at the palace this morning and yesterday. Said the Bey, ‘What am I to deduce from all your assurances of punctuality on the part of your government?’ I answered; ‘Your Excellency will have the goodness to believe, that, when information of our definitive arrangements was received in the United States, the stores, which we have stipulated as the condition of peace with you, were growing on our mountains, at the sources of our rivers.’ ‘Am I to suppose, then,’ said he, ‘your guns and your powder, comprised in that stipulation, were growing on your mountains? You find no difficulty in discharging your obligations with Algiers. Do you suppose me less able than Algiers to compel the punctual observance of treaties?’ ‘By no means,’ said I; ‘if we have been more attentive to Algiers than to you, it is not because we consider you less respectable, but more just than Algiers.’ ‘We must make an end of compliments,’ said he. ‘It would give me pain to affront you; but facts justify the conclusion, that, if you suppose me just, you study to amuse my justice. Denmark may furnish you a caution against such a reliance.’ ‘I suppose,’ said I, ‘your Excellency can nave no doubt that the residue of our peace presents have long since been at sea ; but the winds have been many days against us.' 'They have been against us three years,' said he. 'Your Excellency will recollect they were very favorable last spring.' 'Not so favorable as I had been flattered to believe they would have been,' said he. 'What can be done ?' I asked. 'Can we make war upon the elements ?' 'You can choose your measures ; and you need not be surprised, if I reserve to myself the same privilege,' he answered. 'Permit me,' said I, 'to demand an explanation of this.' 'Events will explain it,' said he. I observed, 'If this manner of evasion cover a menace, I ought to know it for my government, in giving passports to your cruisers.' 'In this,' said he, 'you will use your own discretion. If you give them, it is an evidence that you are at peace with me. If you refuse them, I have nothing serious to apprehend from it.'"

Towards the end of the same month, an American ship, the Anna Maria, arrived at the road of Porto Farina, laden with plank, timber, masts, oars, iron, to the value of twelve thousand dollars. On the 30th, Eaton embarked at Tunis, in an open boat, belonging to the Bey, and reached the ship, ten leagues off, in the evening of the same day. The invoice and bill of lading were received the next day. The Bey's government were compelled to acknowledge the excellent quality of the articles forwarded by this ship from the United States ; though they affected to complain that the plank and the oars were too short, and to be dissatisfied that the keels, guns, and powder were not forwarded also. "I believe the facts to be," says Eaton, "the government are dissatisfied, that any thing has come forward If this opinion require evidence, I consider it sufficient to state, that the United States are the only nation, which have at this moment, a rich, unguarded commerce in the Mediterranean ; and that the Barbary Regencies are pirates." The extraordinary concessions, made to the Tunisians by the Christian states of Europe, had greatly diminished the importance of a peace with the Americans ; and apprehensions were still entertained by the consul, that the deficiency of naval and military supplies already furnished would be seized upon as a pretext for capturing American merchantmen. The government, however, treated the consul personally with great respect, and he endeavored to maintain a good understanding by reciprocating their civilities.

Eaton was anxious to obtain the discharge of the Anna Maria as soon as possible, to save the heavy expense of demurrage, which, if in proportion to the cost of the Hero's delay, would have amounted to three thousand dollars. The governor of Porto Farina was head of the admiralty and supervisor of all the arsenals. "To him," says Eaton, "I paid court, and put into his hands an argument, which convinced him of the propriety of discharging the American before the Swedes; and he, faithful to his engagement with me, prevailed on the Bey to make this an order." But the Sapitapa sent him a message, to the effect that the Regency had need of the American ship to send to Marseilles. Three days were consumed before this matter was arranged. Eaton steadily refused to yield to the demand, reminding the Sapitapa that it was a violation of the promise made in the preceding April. The minister threatened to use force; but Eaton assured him, that, put what he might on board, he would order the ship to America, and leave the event to be settled by the two governments. At length, the Sapitapa, finding Eaton resolute in maintaining his ground, offered a freight of four thousand dollars, and perquisites to the captain. These terms were accepted in preference to the hazard attending a refusal; the acceptance involving no dishonorable concession to the government of Tunis.

CHAPTER VII.

Difficulties between Tripoli and the United States. — Project of a Commercial Convention with Tunis. — Its Failure. — New Demands of the Bey. — Determination to send a Squadron into the Mediterranean. — Outrage upon Mr. Cathcart, and Satisfaction demanded.

FOR some time previous to the events just related, the affairs of the United States had been verging to a war with Tripoli. Eaton maintained a most friendly correspondence with the consul stationed there, Mr. Cathcart; but Mr. O'Brien, the consul at Algiers, had excited his suspicions, by what he deemed improper transactions with Jews, with whom he was engaged in commercial speculations. The following passage, at the conclusion of an able review of the relations of Christian powers with the Barbary regencies, expresses in a few words his opinion of the present position of American affairs. "America, in adhering to the injunction, 'Agree with thine adversary quickly while thou art in the way with him,' has rejected counsel of equal authority, and more in point, 'Cast not your pearls before swine.' A concise statement of our actual situation with these freebooters, I consider to be war with Tripoli inev- itable. Tunis, now that the Anna Maria has arrived, will let us be tranquil until after the residue of our peace stipulations shall have been received, and the Bey shall have done with Spain. At Algiers, if the interests of the United States be not betrayed, they are not defended; nor will things alter for the better there, so long as we are represented by Bacri & Co.”* At the conclusion of the same letter, Eaton intimates a wish to return to the United States, as soon as the affairs of the agency should be so arranged as to promise a few years’ tranquillity, having already been absent from his friends three years.

The cargo of the Anna Maria was not wholly satisfactory to the avarice of the Bey. The present of jewels still formed the theme of vexatious demands, and Eaton’s attempts to evade them had but little success. Orders were finally given to purchase them in England; and despatches were forwarded to Eaton from the Department of State, informing him of this determination, and instructing him to keep the American minister at the court of St. James advised of the progress of affairs in the Barbary States. In a letter to Mr. King, dated December 29th, 1800, he says, “At Tripoli, affairs wear a menacing front, and I am apprehensive, except Mr. Cathcart receive some succor from government, before the spring season invites the corsairs to sea, we shall be insulted by that regency. At Algiers, the United States, like Spain, in the pure spirit of Christian charity, bear all things, endure all things; and we shall live in the merit of adhering to this Christian principle, so long as a Jew company control our affairs there." A few sentences from a letter to the American minister at Lisbon, under date of January 17th, 1801, exhibit more strongly Eaton's feelings at this period. "I have no longer a hope of obtaining any relinquishment of this Bey's claims to jewels. The astonishing abasement of the Christian nations with these regencies the last year, leave us without a precedent of resistance; and the almost total neglect of government to my reiterated representations deprive me of necessary arguments to combat the exorbitant exactions of this Regency. I have only to lament, with unavailing mortification, that these representations have merited so little attention. My country will lament also. For it is now obvious, that every conjecture I have hazarded, both respecting the inefficiency of the guarantee of Algiers, and also the dangers we risk by a too sparing economy, will be realized."

The affairs of the United States and Tripoli grew more critical every day. The Bashaw's demands were too exorbitant to be complied with;

and the examples of other Christian nations, in submitting to his degrading exactions, made it impossible for Mr. Cathcart to negotiate with any success. Eaton wrote him a letter of advice ; counselling him to seize the opportunity afforded by a Swedish frigate, to send Mrs. Cathcart to Europe. In February, a circular letter passed through the American office at Tunis, from the consul at Tripoli, cautioning all American vessels to quit the Mediterranean, on account of the threats of the Bashaw. In a letter to Mr. Marshall, Secretary of State of the United States, dated March 6th, 1801, Mr. Eaton writes ; “ It is certain, the Bashaw of Tripoli is fitting out his corsairs against Americans ; and so sanguine is he of the success of the expedition, that he already begins to calculate his profits, even in presence of Christian agents. Mr. Cathcart was obliged to leave Tripoli, and charged Mr. Nissen, the Danish consul, with the American affairs during his absence.” Eaton opened a correspondence with that gentleman, for the purpose of making such arrangements as circumstances allowed, for the subsistence and comfort of any Americans who might be carried as prisoners into Tripolitan ports. The consul’s despatches were sent to Eaton, to be forwarded to the United States. He regarded them as of so much importance, that he chartered a Ragu-san brig, to proceed with them directly to their destination. The Bashaw demanded, as a condition of sparing the United States, two hundred and twenty-five thousand Spanish dollars, prompt payment, and twenty-five thousand annually; the Swedes having agreed to these terms. In his letter, accompanying these despatches, Eaton says, "If our government yield these terms to the Bashaw of Tripoli, it will be absolutely necessary to make provisions for a requisition of double the amount for the Bey of Tunis. Algiers will also be respected according to rank. If the United States will have a free commerce in this sea, they must defend it. There is no alternative. The restless spirit of these marauders cannot be restrained."

In the mean time, the Bey continued his importunities in relation to the jewels, and meditated new requisitions on the United States. He required the consul to inform the President, that he needed a supply of guns, for his castle batteries. The consul refused to comply, because his previous experience had taught him, that when such a demand was once communicated in a despatch, it was assumed as conceded. He told the Bey, however, that, if he would propose to exchange the guns due to him by treaty, for others of a larger calibre, the President would probably find no difficulty in making the arrangement. To this the Bey demurred, and finally determined to write to the President himself. "While we are in difficulty with Tripoli," says Eaton, "it seems to me good policy to be on good terms with Tunis; but, if government should think differently, and, in lieu of a ship with presents, will consign to me a transport, with one thousand marines, between twenty and thirty-eight years of age, native Americans, and properly officered, under convoy of a forty-four gun frigate, I pledge myself to surprise Porto Farina, and destroy the Bey's arsenal." The Bey's letter was forwarded to the United States, in company with the despatches from the regencies, by the Ragusan brig. It contained a demand of forty iron twenty-four pounders, as a token of the friendship of the American President. On this occasion, as well as on many others, Eaton was urgent in his advice, that the United States should make some effectual display of their power in the Mediterranean, and change the degrading posture they had heretofore occupied, of tributaries to a horde of pirates, for a more manly attitude, and one more consonant with national honor. His representations had been disregarded, or at least nothing had been done in consequence of them. Eaton attributes the apparent apathy of government to the influence of Mr. O'Brien, the consul at Algiers, whom he does not hesitate to charge with corrupt dealings with the Jews. It seems, that a strong personal hostility had long existed between this gentleman and Mr. Cathcart; and, as Mr. Cathcart's views coincided with Eaton's, it was supposed by the latter, that O'Brien's animosity lent an additional strength of coloring to his representations to the government at home. It is probable that the warmth of Eaton's feelings, and his attachment to Mr. Cathcart, may have warped his better judgment. While he was negotiating with the piratical government of Tunis, the war of party was raging with its greatest violence in the United States. The interests, involved in our intercourse with the Barbary powers, were not likely to occupy, to any great extent, the attention of the people of the United States, amidst the deafening clamors of the political strife. The distance of the scene of action lessened, probably, its importance in the eyes of the cabinet at Washington. We may, therefore, account for the tardiness of our government in adopting more energetic measures, without supposing the existence of treachery, or culpable carelessness, on the part of the agent at Algiers.

Before the declaration of war by Tripoli, time enough had elapsed to communicate the alarm to all concerned in American trade throughout the Mediterranean. The Bashaw, moreover, contrary to his usual custom, gave permission to the American agent to leave the Regency. Hostilities were publicly announced on the 11th of May, and extraordinary measures were taken to communicate information of the event to the American minister at Lisbon, and to the government of the United States. Mr. Cathcart drew up a protest against the conduct of the Bashaw and his ministers, showing clearly that it contravened the letter and spirit of existing treaties, and unfolding, at considerable length, the subjects of dispute, and the cause of the war. It was anticipated by Eaton, that this state of things would rouse the attention of government, and that a sufficient naval force would be sent into the Mediterranean to protect our commerce, and punish the aggressors. With his characteristic ardor, he proposed to the Secretary of State, to leave the affairs at Tunis in charge of Mr. Cathcart, whose arrival from Tripoli was daily expected, and to join the fleet with a view to assist their operations by his superior local knowledge.

In the mean time Eaton had conceived the project of a commercial convention with the government of Tunis, by which the existing treaty should be amended, and some of its articles rendered more favorable to the United States. His ultimate object, in venturing upon this unauthorized negotiation, was to place the peaceful relations of the two countries on a more permanent basis, by engaging powerful commercial interests, on both sides, in favor of such a connexion. He entertained a high opinion of the Bey's sagacity, and felt assured that he could convince him of the advantage to his country of an extended commercial intercourse with the United States. Considerable progress had already been made in effecting his object, but he was finally unsuccessful. The causes of his failure are thus detailed in a letter to the Department of State.

"My project of a commercial convention with this Regency, I am apprehensive will produce nothing. Two circumstances operate to impede it. The protection given by the French to the Italian states, and the delays of the United States to forward their treaty stipulations. On the 27th ultimo, entered two corsairs from a cruise, a xebec of twenty-four twelve pounders, and a corvette of twenty brass nines, which had been boarded and disarmed by a French detachment commanded by Vice-Admiral Gaunthomme. The affair is so novel, so well done, and at the same time so laconic, that it seems worthy of detail. 'Who are you?' hailed the republican. 'Tunisians,' was the answer. 'Whom do you cruise against?' 'Neapolitans.' 'What! do you not know that the Neapolitans are our friends? Dare you insult the allies of Frenchmen? Overboard in an instant with every offensive weapon, or I send you to the bottom.' The order was promptly obeyed. 'Go make the compliments of the First Consul to the Bey, your master. Tell him, it was not his intention to regard your breach of faith in renewing the war. You might have remained tranquil and undisturbed at home; but, if we find you abroad in search of mischief, we deprive you of the means. Tell him to beware of provoking the resentment of the First Consul; it will be terrible to him and to his country.'

"The Admiral wrote to the Bey in the same style. His chagrin and mortification may be better imagined than described. These were two of his best cruisers. But the contempt is more grating than the injury done him. He cannot aspire to avenge himself of the French. He dares no more look for prey from Italy. What shall he do? The Americans are a species of Christians, somewhat similar in their religion and government to the French, and must therefore expiate the affront. We are now the only nation on earth, against which Barbary can safely cruise; the Spaniards are included in the list of French allies. For these reasons, this example of the French, though it is the only one worthy of imitation with these people, that has happened since my residence here, is extremely prejudicial to our affairs, and its influence is instantaneous. Since it took place, the Bey has totally changed his tone of treatment, has abruptly broken off the discussion of our commercial convention, and has formally announced to me, that, except the entire peace stipulations arrive in four months, I shall have his passport to leave his kingdom. I shall make my arrangements accordingly.

“The whole goes to prove the exactness of an opinion which I have long since advanced, that the mania of piracy is so blended with the system of these States, that it cannot be cured but by sovereign treatment. The arguments I have used with the Bey, to effect the object I proposed to myself, uniformly attracted his attention, received his assent, and induced flattering prospects of a favorable issue; but, when they came into contact with his cruising views, availed nothing. This piratical enthusiasm is as obstinate as religious bigotry, which yields to no force of reasoning or sense of humanity.”

Soon after the date of the above-cited letter, a fire broke out at night in the Bey's palace, which destroyed fifty thousand stands of arms

In a few days after this event, a message came to the American consul, requiring him to wait upon the Bey. Eaton was ill at the time, and could not comply; as soon as his health permitted, he attended at the palace, and was surprised by a new demand upon the United States. The Bey informed him, that he had apportioned his loss among his friends, and the quota of the American government was ten thousand stands of arms; and that he must state the demand to his government without delay. The consul positively refused, insisting, that it would be impossible for the United States to comply with so unreasonable and extraordinary a demand, and that the Bey's government was in a much more eligible position to order the arms from Europe, than the government of the United States. "If the Bey had any intention of purchasing the arms from Europe," said the minister, "he could do it without your agency. He did not send for you to ask your advice, but to order you to communicate his demands to your government."

Eaton replied, that he came to assure them, that no such communication should be made. "The Bey will write himself," said he. In that case, the consul replied, it would become his duty to forward the letter. But he assured the minister, that he would never receive a single musket from the United States, and told him plainly, that a respect to decency, if not a sense of gratitude, ought to restrain the Bey from such an extraordinary claim. Within the last eighteen months, two large ships' cargoes had been received as a present, and another ship, laden for him, was already on its passage. The minister replied, that the supplies already received were only in payment of a stipulation, long since due as the condition of peace; the other claims were such as were made upon all friendly nations once in two or three years, and the Americans, like other Christians, would be obliged to comply with it, as an established custom. Eaton was inflexible. He persisted in declaring, that the treaty stipulations were the condition of a perpetual peace, and when their payment was completed, an end would be put to all further contributions to Tunis.

The minister was angry, and told Eaton that he might prepare himself to leave the kingdom very soon, if he persisted in holding such language. "If change of style on my part," said the consul, "be the condition of residence here, I will leave the Bey's kingdom to-morrow morning." "We will give you a month," said the minister. "I ask but six hours." "But you will write?" "No." "It is your duty to write." "For delinquency in duty, this is not the place where I am to be questioned." "I tell you again," continued he, "your peace depends on your compliance with this demand of my master." "If so," said Eaton, "on me be the responsibility of breaking the peace. I wish you a good morning."

As had been anticipated, the conduct of Tripoli, and the urgent representations of Cathcart and Eaton, roused the new administration, in which Mr. Jefferson had succeeded Mr. Adams as President of the United States, and Mr. Madison had been placed at the head of the Department of State, to a more efficient course of measures with the Barbary powers. It was determined to send into the Mediterranean a squadron of three frigates and a sloop of war, under the command of Commodore Dale, to be employed in the defence of American commerce against the piracies of Tripoli, and of any other Barbary states, that should follow her perfidious example.

The time was considered by the government as peculiarly favorable for exhibiting an imposing force in the Mediterranean, as the country was at peace with all the rest of the world, and the naval power might be thus employed without adding much to the expense of supporting it at home. Great reliance was placed on Eaton's local knowledge, to give the measure the most advantageous impression to the character and interests of the United States. He was instructed to use all his endeavors to satisfy the Bey, that his government was desirous of maintaining peace with all nations, and that, if the flag of the United States should be engaged in war with either of the Barbary regencies, it would be a war of defence and necessity, and not of choice. He was, also, authorized to inform the Bey, that a vessel was preparing to take in a cargo, which would complete the presents due to him, and that jewels, to the amount of ten thousand dollars, had been ordered to be prepared in London.

Eaton's position at Tunis had been so embarrassing, with so little to lighten the burden of incessant negotiations, and his representations had been treated at home with so much apparent neglect, that he had become disgusted with his situation, and repeatedly requested permission to return. But the new aspect of affairs encouraged him to hope, that the Barbary powers might be brought to assume a less insolent attitude towards the United States. His opinions had finally prevailed, and the President, unwilling to lose the services of so efficient an agent, at such a critical moment, urged him to remain at his post.

Another cause of discontent was removed.

It has been seen, that his differences with Mr. O'Brien were the source of perpetual disquietude, and even led him to suspect that gentleman's integrity. O'Brien had lately requested to be replaced by another consul; his request had been complied with, and, after this testimonial of his government's approbation, Eaton's situation was rendered more satisfactory. His correspondence shows that he engaged in the difficult and delicate duties of his office with new ardor. His letters to Mr. Cathcart, who had embarked for Leghorn, on the declaration of war by Tripoli, are marked by his characteristic determination and bold patriotism, and are written in a tone of undiminished friendship and respect.

In his passage to Leghorn, Mr. Cathcart had been pillaged by the commander of a Tunisian corsair, notwithstanding the inviolability of his person, as a public agent of the United States. As soon as Eaton received intelligence of this outrage, he presented himself at the palace, and demanded satisfaction for the insult offered the nation in the person of its representative. The Bey refused to comply with the demand, and avowed his determination never to admit Cathcart into his kingdom. Eaton returned to his office, and immediately addressed a long and energetic letter to the Bey, in French, in which he recapitulated the recent indications of a hostile disposition on the part of his government, towards the United States, exposed the intrigues of the Jews at Algiers, and explained the causes of their enmity to Mr. Cathcart. The letter concluded by demanding permission for Mr. Cathcart to return to Tunis, and await the orders of his government, and claimed full satisfaction for the insult offered him by the Tunisian corsair.

The next morning a polite note was sent to Eaton from the palace, requesting an interview, and promising him entire satisfaction. He went accordingly, and was listened to with attention. The Bey promised to bastinado the captain of the corsair, and to consider further of the admission of Mr. Cathcart. Eaton learned, subsequently, that his suspicions of Jewish intrigue at Algiers against Mr. Cathcart were correct, and that letters had been written from Tripoli to Tunis, soliciting the Bey not to receive him into his dominions. At his next interview, he spoke of Cathcart's coming to Tunis, as a thing settled, and was not contradicted.

CHAPTER VIII.

Arrival of the American Squadron. — Tripoli blockaded. — Proceedings at Tripoli. — Issue of the Expedition. — Project of dethroning the reigning Bashaw and restoring his Brother. — Eaton's Voyage to Leghorn. — Return to Tunis. — Reported Capture of Tunisian Vessels carrying Provisions to Tripoli. — Discussions arising from it. — A Tunisian Xebec arrested and examined by an American Schooner. — Conduct of the Schooner's Crew, and Trouble growing out of it. — Eaton's successful Interposition.

ON the 17th of July, 1801, Commodore Dale arrived at Tunis, in the United States frigate President, with the sloop Enterprise, and the day following Captain Bainbridge, in the Essex. After taking in a supply of fresh water and provisions, these ships of war proceeded immediately to their destination. The arrival of this fleet produced a strong sensation at the palace. Eaton ascertained, from a confidential friend, that Tripoli was already in a famishing condition, and dependent on Tunis for supplies; and it was intimated to him, that he would immediately receive application for passports of safe conduct for several Tunisian vessels, already taking in cargoes of provisions for Tripoli.

To evade such an application, to turn the occasion to the best advantage in striking a blow at the enemy, Eaton immediately issued a circular, declaring Tripoli in a state of blockade, and that all vessels attempting to enter that port would be dealt with according to the laws of nations applicable to such cases. As all commerce was monopolized by the government, this proceeding caused a great commotion. The principal commercial agent was sent to Eaton's house, with a demand, that the blockade should be so modified as not to effect the interests of the Tunisian Regency. A long discussion ensued, but Eaton firmly maintained his ground.

The agent declared, that he was authorized to state, that adherence to this position would endanger the peace with Tunis, and left the house in a violent rage. In a letter to Commodore Dale, Eaton writes; "Tripoli is in great distress. The corsairs are all at sea. She is starving in her capital, and will be thrown into consternation at your unexpected appearance. If this position, which the good providence of God gives us, can be sternly held a few months, Tripoli will be compelled to ask peace on our own terms. The object is so desirable, that it seems worth exertions; more especially so, as Algiers and Tunis are looking to this rupture as a precedent for their intercourse with the United States."

Commodore Dale, having been joined by the frigate Philadelphia, appeared before Tripoli on the 26th of July. The Bashaw proposed a truce, but his terms were rejected. The principal effect, however, of this expedition, during the present season, was to maintain the blockade, in which the Commodore concurred, and to prevent American merchantmen from falling into the hands of the Tripolitan corsairs.

The reigning Bashaw of Tripoli, a few years before the American war, had usurped the throne, rightfully held by his elder brother, Hamet Caramegli, whom he had driven into exile. It was suggested originally by Mr. Cathcart, that advantage might be taken of this state of affairs to inflict a signal chastisement on the perfidious Bashaw, by restoring the banished prince to his dominions. The conduct of the Tripolitan government justified this measure; and the prospect of holding up to the other Barbary powers an ominous example of what they might expect from a war with the United States encouraged the American consuls to attempt it. Besides, it was generally understood, that the people of Tripoli were suffering severely from the blockade, and were ripe for a revolt against a usurper, whose oppressions, added to his original crime against his brother, had already rendered his government intolerable. Hamet, the exile, was residing at Tunis, under the protection of the Bey. Eaton sought him out, and found him ready to enter into the scheme. It was concerted between them, that an attack should be made upon the usurper by land, while the navy was engaged in active operations by sea. Nothing, however, could be immediately attempted.

The following passage is from a letter, written about this time, to Mr. Samuel Lyman, a member of Congress. "To avoid the expense of prolonging the war, Tripoli should be bombarded. This is a very practicable measure. Commodore Dale thinks, that four frigates and three bomb-ketches are an ample force to do it effectually. He also supposes a descent on the coast at the same time would have good effect. I am of the same opinion, and am so confident of its practicability, that I will volunteer in the enterprise, in any character consistent with my former military rank and my present station, with two thousand active light troops. Perhaps it is my duty, and, if so, will not be deemed vanity to say, that, in case our affairs continue tranquil in Tunis, of which there is a moral certainty, I could be more serviceable to my country at Tripoli than here, because I know the tactics of the Barbary and Turkish land forces, their mode of attack and manner of fighting, and for this reason should probably have the more influence in assisting the manœuvres of an assault. If such an enterprise should be resolved upon, an adjutant and inspector general to the troops would be requisite. I should be willing to take the responsibility of that office upon myself during the war."

Such was Eaton's view of the proper mode of conducting the war with Tripoli; and there can be no reasonable doubt, that the project would have been crowned with complete success, had his suggestions been listened to. He was destined, however, to attempt and execute a more hazardous and brilliant enterprise, as will be seen in the sequel.

On the 1st of December, the ship Peace and Plenty, Captain Richard Woods, arrived at Tunis, under convoy of the George Washington, with another supply of naval and military stores. After attending to the unloading of the cargo, Eaton obtained permission of the Bey to leave the affairs of the United States in the hands of Dr. William Turner of the United States'

Navy, then at Tunis. The declining state of his health made it necessary for him to resign, for a short time, the labors of his office, and to take a voyage for its recovery. The George Washington offering him a passage to Leghorn, he embarked for that port on the 13th of December, having furnished Dr. Turner with full and precise instructions by which to govern his conduct during the consul's absence.

The ship arrived at Naples on the 21st, and was ordered into quarantine, at the conclusion of which he seized the opportunity of submitting to his Sicilian Majesty's prime minister the question, whether the Americans would be allowed to land Moorish prisoners in his territory, in case of need, and on what terms; and suggested to him the advantages, that would accrue to both nations from a commercial treaty. The prime minister and other distinguished personages of Naples were profuse in their civilities and attentions to the American consul, and expressions of a cordial sympathy with the cause of the United States. He had also a private audience with the King of Sardinia, who happened to be in Naples, and obtained permission for the fleet to enter the ports of his island and procure provisions.

On the 30th of January, 1802, he arrived at Leghorn. The benefit of the voyage to his health was less than he expected, and he determined to hasten his return to Tunis. This resolution was confirmed by the receipt of intelligence, that the Bashaw of Tripoli was making overtures to his exiled brother, for the purpose of frustrating the concerted enterprise, above explained, against his territories. Eaton was anxious to be in Tunis before this consummation could be effected. He arrived on the 12th of March, and found Hamet on the point of yielding to the Bashaw's proposition. The government of Derne, a province of Tripoli, was offered him, and he was about to depart to assume the command.

Eaton represented to him the impropriety and danger of such a step, and that probably his brother's sole object was to cut his throat. He told the frightened prince, that, if he departed, he should consider him in the light of an enemy, and should use his best efforts to send him and his retinue prisoners of war to the United States. Hamet proposed going to Malta and waiting the issue there; but Eaton would only consent at present, that he should go to Leghorn or Sardinia. The refusal of the Bey to furnish any further supplies of provisions, added to the alarm and distress of the unfortunate man; and he readily yielded to any terms, which the consul saw fit to prescribe. It was finally agreed that he should depart for Malta, with letters of recommendation from Eaton to the American commander, there to await the arrival of the fleet; thence to go with the fleet to Tripoli, and demand the restitution of his throne and his rights. Precaution was taken, however, to guard against a change of Hamet's resolution and a violation of his engagements, by a preconcerted plan to arrest him, if he should attempt to shape his course for Derne. The final agreement of the exiled Bashaw was accomplished in part by the assistance of the Sapitapa, to whom Eaton promised ten thousand dollars on the successful issue of the expedition.

Meantime the intercourse between the consul and the government of the Bey was not of the most friendly character. An angry interview in April terminated by the Bey's ordering Eaton to quit his court, and hold himself in readiness to embark on board the first American ship of war, that should arrive in port. The consul turned short upon his heel, returned to his office, and ordered, that no more passports should be filled out for Tunisian cruisers. This proceeding was immediately reported to the Bey, and his commercial agent hastened to beg, that the order might be countermanded, intimating that the Bey had no wish to provoke a war by sending away the consul, but only to obtain another more capable of cherishing peace than Eaton. He was answered, that the consul had taken his ground, which would not be surrendered until the Bey had changed his position.

A few days after, he was invited to the palace by the Bey; and discussed with him the relative advantages of peace and war. The minister professed a willingness to maintain the peace with the Americans on the same footing as with the other small Christian nations, but they must have a consul with less fantasia, and more friendly to the Barbary interests. Eaton replied, that he daily expected permission to return to the United States, and to be succeeded by his colleague, Mr. Cathcart. The Bey pretended astonishment, and declared, that Mr. Cathcart should never come into his dominions on any pretext whatever.

About this time, a rumor reached the Bey, that an American frigate had captured four coasting vessels belonging to his subjects, bound to Tripoli, laden with wheat, barley, oil, and other provisions. The consul was summoned to the palace, and immediate restitution of vessels and cargo was demanded. The Bey asserted a right to carry provisions, in all cases, to his friends, and maintained the principle of “free bottoms, free goods.” Eaton demed the right, and affirmed, that the principle was never construed to extend to a blockaded port. Seasonable and formal notice of the blockade of Tripoli had been given. If, after this, he permitted his subjects to carry provisions to that port, he took the responsibility on himself; if they engaged in these enterprises without his consent, it was a voluntary risk on their part, and they had no reason to complain in case of capture; since the captures, being made according to acknowledged maxims of war, were, of course, good prize to the captors.

The Bey talked of reprisals, and Eaton of retaliation. The Bey desired Eaton to write to the American commander to capture no more of his vessels, but to turn them from their course if they were found carrying provisions to Tripoli; the request was declined, but the interview was concluded without the usual display of anger on the part of the Bey. It was afterwards ascertained, that the report was without foundation, the captures having in fact been made by the Swedes. The only use of these discussions, therefore, was to give the Bey an intimation of what he might expect, whenever his vessels should be captured by the Americans under like circumstances.

An incident occurred in the Mediterranean

this season, which gave Eaton great concern, and brought temporary dishonor upon the American name. A Tunisian xebec was arrested and examined by the commander of an American schooner, Lieutenant Sterrett. It was afterwards ascertained, that several articles, of no great value, had been plundered, and, on the arrival of the crew at Tunis, loud complaints were made to the government. Every term of reproach and insult was heaped upon the Americans, and for a time the worst consequences were apprehended. Eaton was instantly summoned to the palace, and found the Bey in a towering passion. "You, Sir," said he, "you, who boast eternally of the rectitude and honor of your government, by this act stand convicted, that you represent a nation of pirates. What! do you bring your warriors from your country, destitute of shirts,* commissioned to fall upon and strip my defenceless subjects. Had you captured this vessel, I should have viewed the act in a different light; but the protection of your right to navigate the sea freely, as your President expresses his motive for sending a squadron before Tripoli, I find to be a system of plunder. But, to show you that I am not to be the subject of your aggressions, I will immediately send every American you have in port, in irons, to work at the Goletta, yourself at their head." By energetic assurances, that restitution should be made for every article of property plundered, and that the criminals should receive exemplary punishment, Eaton succeeded in calming the rage of the Bey. The consul was indefatigable in his exertions to fulfil his promise; and he had the satisfaction of proving to the Bey, that the crime was confined to one marine and two common sailors of the schooner's crew, and that no officer was in the slightest degree implicated.

Intelligence was received from Lieutenant Sterrett, that the Bashaw of Tripoli was making great defensive preparations, but that general discontent pervaded all classes of his subjects, not excepting the Turkish soldiers, who derived most benefit from the war. The exiled Hamet was known to be in Malta, waiting for the arrival of Commodore Truxton, who had been appointed to the command of the American squadron in the Mediterranean. The prospect of success was promising, and no doubt was entertained, that the issue of the war would be favorable to the American arms.

Intervention of the Bey of Tunis in the Affairs of Tripoli and the United States. — Arrival of the Constellation at Tunis. — Demand of the Bey for a Ship renewed. — Eaton communicates his Project against Tripoli to the Commanders of the Squadron. — It is disapproved by them. — Brig Franklin captured by a Tripolitan. — Efforts to procure the Liberation of the Crew. — Further Communications with the exiled Bashaw. — Differences with the Commanders of the American Squadron, and Difficulties of Eaton's Situation in Tunis. — New Demands of the Bey. — The exiled Bashaw leaves Malta for Derne. — Arrival of Commodore Morris at Tunis. — His Arrest. — Eaton's Rupture with the Bey, and Return to the United States.

On the 24th of May, Eaton was summoned, by a note from the prime minister, to the palace. On his appearance there he was surprised to find the Bey in an unusually complaisant mood; and, in conversation with the minister, he ascertained, that the Bey's object was to make a proposition of peace with Tripoli, through the mediation and under the guarantee of the government of Tunis.

The minister informed Eaton, that he was authorized to propose the negotiation. It was replied, that the United States had no inducements to desire war with any nation, and if Tripoli would make suitable retractions, the subject of peace might be considered; but even then it would be considered hazardous to treat with the reigning Bashaw, after having seen such flagrant violations of faith. The remaining part of the interview is given in Eaton's own words, in a letter to the Secretary of State.

“‘If the Bey of Tunis would act as mediator between the parties, and take upon himself the guarantee of the peace on the part of Tripoli, would it remove this difficulty?’

“‘We have great reliance on the good faith, equity, and magnanimity of His Excellency the Bey of Tunis, and should be very secure in his responsibility; but is it certain, that this Bey would take upon himself the guarantee of a peace in behalf of Tripoli?’

“‘Yes. But if you talk of retractions and indemnities, it would be idle to talk of peace. On the contrary, according to all custom, you must make the Bashaw a small present; though he would be willing to put up with something less than what he at first demanded.’

“‘We were not the first to violate the peace. We are not the first to demand it. If Tripoli be solicitous for it, she must abandon the idea of imposing conditions; she will most certainly never receive a caroube* in consideration of her friendship. We do not set any value upon it.’

“‘Nay; but if you place no value on her friendship, the security of your commerce in this sea, and the saving of the expense of armaments, are objects of consideration, in which you consult your own interest.’

“‘We never supposed our commerce in this sea more secure than at present, notwithstanding the war with Tripoli; and, as to the expense of armaments, we accumulate nothing on that score from making the Mediterranean the manœuvring ground of our seamen. We shall probably always have a squadron in this sea.’

“‘But Tripoli is very poor; she cannot subsist without the generosity of her friends; give something then on the score of charity.’

“‘Tripoli has forfeited her title of friend. Besides, there is a vast difference between the beggar who seizes my horse by the bit, and, with a pistol at my breast, demands my purse, and him who, with one hand pressed to his heart, and the other hanging with his hat, asks charity for the love of God. The former merits chastisement; the latter excites commiseration. I leave you to apply the figure.'

"'I feel it. But the Barbary Regencies never make peace without presents.'

"'It is high time, then, that there should be a precedent.'

"'But you say you are disposed for peace.'

"'Yes; but you are not to understand me that we either wish or will accept it on dishonorable terms.'

"'There can be nothing dishonorable in making a small voluntary present to Tripoli.'

"'Drop the subject, if you please. Tripoli is not in a right position to receive expressions of our hospitality. Nor am I vested with powers to negotiate. I can only express to you the general, but fixed sentiment of my government and country, that we prefer peace to war, if we can have it on honorable terms; and you are at liberty to express this sentiment to Tripoli. She may take advantage of it if she thinks proper. Otherwise, four or five years of warfare with that state will be but a pastime to our young warriors.'

"'I shall send off a cruiser,' said the minister, 'with the result of this interview.'

"At evening the commercial agent was at my house. Went over the same ground. Was sure, that we should never have a peace without paying something; it would disgrace the Regency; but he seemed extremely solicitous to have permission to write something promising to Tripoli on the subject of a negotiation. He said, what the minister had asserted in the morning, that the only pretext the Bashaw of Tripoli had for breaking faith with the United States, was that the peace was not voluntary on his part, but forced on him by Algiers.

“These overtures go to prove the embarrassed situation of our enemy; and promise, if suitable advantage is taken of it, a peace on our own terms. We hold the high ground of him at all points. I am partial to my original plan of restoring the rightful Bashaw, though nothing was said on the subject at the palace to-day. I think it highly probable, that the reigning Bashaw has offered more powerful arguments to engage this minister in his interest, than either his brother had the means or myself the discretion of offering. Besides, the Bey of Tunis is ignorant of that project. It will be seasonable enough to inform him of it after having insured its success. In the mean time let us amuse the usurper with his own propositions.”

Towards the end of May the United States frigate Constellation, Captain Alexander Murray, arrived at Tunis, bringing the arms prepared for the Bey in London. They were immediately presented, and found highly acceptable; but a former demand was instantly revived through the minister, for a corvette or brig of war, such as had been given to Algiers. He was referred to the treaty stipulations, and the claim, for the present, was silenced.

Mr. Eaton gave an account of his measures with Hamet, to Captains Barron and Bainbridge, of the squadron, immediately on their arrival. His sanguine expectations were somewhat disappointed by the severe criticisms, which those officers made upon his plans. Captain Murray coincided in their views, and rejected the scheme, says Eaton, "in an air of authority and reprimand, which I should not expect, even from the highest departments of government." The conduct of these commanders was regarded by Eaton with contempt, and he did not fail to represent it in language of strong complaint.

The measures objected to had been concerted with the approbation of Mr. Cathcart, and others whose local knowledge and soundness of judgment entitled their opinions to the highest respect. The consul reasonably thought, that a plan formed under such auspices, and sanctioned by such authority, was deserving of more attention than these gentlemen seemed inclined to accord to it. "How is it," he asks, "that every commander, as well as everybody else, who has acted on this coast, comes into this measure; and that three only, who have scarcely or never been here, take on themselves to reject it?"

Captain Murray, however, in the absence of Commodore Truxton, felt bound to put a check to measures, which his instructions, in his opinion, did not authorize him to participate in, and which were likely to cause considerable expense to the United States. Whether his opinion was correct or not, there can be no doubt that he acted from a conscientious regard to his duty.

On the 6th of July, the American brig Franklin, Captain Andrew Morris, was carried into Biserta, captured by a Tripolitan corsair. Information was carried to Eaton by express, from the vice-consul stationed there. The corsair's first plan was to march the ship's crew to the city of Tunis, and thence by land to Tripoli; but the Bey was apprehensive of trouble with the Americans, and objected to the passage of American slaves through his country. The ship and cargo were sold by auction to the commercial agent of the Bey, and the men were chained in the hold of a Tripolitan galley. Every effort was made by the consul to alleviate the sufferings of these unhappy men, but he was prohibited from even exchanging a word with them. Information was despatched in all directions, and strong representations were made, of the importance of watching the harbor of Tunis, which had become a rendezvous for the enemy. The American commanders were urged to attempt the recapture of the prisoners, before their arrival at Tripoli, whither they had been despatched in the galley. The labor was vain; the crew of the Franklin were transported to their place of destination, and held in slavery. A claim was immediately made for their release, on a promise to surrender seven American prisoners in return for a number of Turks who had been released by Commodore Dale the preceding summer. Instructions were also forwarded to Mr. Nyssen, the Danish consul, and acting consul for the United States since Mr. Cathcart's departure, that provision should be made, at the expense of the American government, for the support and comfort of the prisoners. These measures were finally unsuccessful, but the prisoners were set at liberty at the instance of Algiers.

The presence of Hamet, the exiled prince, at Malta, caused great alarm at Tripoli; and the Bashaw immediately seized and confined the chiefs of some of the principal villages, to prevent an insurrection. His subjects, however, with few exceptions, regarded the event as a signal interposition of heaven, and looked forward to the restoration of their rightful sovereign, and the reëstablishment of peace with the United States. The situation of Hamet was such, in the mean time, that Eaton was obliged to furnish him with funds for the supply of his present wants, as appears from the following letter, dated August 6th, 1802.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY HAMET CARAMELLI, BASHAW OF TRIPOLI.

“SIR,

“I have had the honor to receive your Excellency’s letter of the 16th ultimo; and I improve this first opportunity to request Mr. Pulis to furnish you with two thousand hard dollars on the credit of the United States; which I hope will be a relief to your situation until the arrival of our Commodore, who is hourly expected here. He arrived at Gibraltar early in June, but has been detained in that quarter for the arrangement of public affairs with the Emperor of Morocco. I hope your Excellency’s patience will not be exhausted. Remember that your brother thirsts for your blood. I have learned from a certain source, that his project of getting you to Derne was to murder you. He is now more determined than ever, because he has intercepted some of your letters to your friends in Tripoli. You cannot be safe.

therefore, in any part of your Regency unless you enter it in your true character of sovereign. I believe in God, the mighty and the just, that this event is not far distant. In the mean time, permit me to recommend to your Excellency to keep up a correspondence with those of your party in Tripoli, and with your subjects of the country. Let them be persuaded, that your friends will not abandon you, until, by the help of God, they shall see you restored to your faithful people. Give them assurances to redress their grievances and to treat them like a mild and just prince. And do every thing to detach them from the interest of the usurper.

“I have the honor to be, Sir, &c.

“WILLIAM EATON.”

The situation of the consul became more and more difficult and disagreeable every day. The differences between him and the officers of the squadron, not only annoyed his feelings in private, but lessened his influence as a public agent. He was exposed to many perplexing obstacles in the discharge of his duties, and his representations were received with sneers. The following passage from a letter to the Secretary of State, presents a strong picture of his condition at this moment.

“My exile is become insupportable here.

Abandoned by my countrymen in command, no advice from government to regulate my conduct, and my own exertions failing of effect, I am left subject, though not yet submissive, to the most intolerable abuse and personal vexations. Anxiety, perplexity, and a climate unfavorable to my constitution, waste my health.

“The position I have taken and held with this Bey, in regard to passports for his merchantmen for Tripoli, has excited a temper and disposition in this court, to distress me in my personal concerns. I have frequently stated, that my salary is an inadequate support. The check, which Captain Murray thought proper to put on my public measures, has not less affected my public character. Thus situated, I am consuming life, property, and perhaps public reputation here, without the consoling prospect of having the merit of being useful to my country. Why should I remain at a post which is no longer tenable? Again I repeat, my individual resources are insufficient barriers against the avarice of this regency. From the first moment of my agency here, it was apparent to me, that submission to the demands of this Bey would only sharpen avidity. I stated this apprehension in my communications to government; it was thought too lively! My measures to chastise a perfidious enemy are now branded by commanders as speculative; the effusions of a disordered fancy! Is it not enough, that I have sacrificed almost four years to the service of my country, in a state of painful sequestration from all rational enjoyment? Will anybody allege, that I have not discharged my duty with an upright zeal? And are such the rewards of my services? To be branded, unheard in my own defence, and by a solitary captain of a frigate, with speculation and insanity!

“It were impossible to keep these things concealed here, even if they had been transacted with less publicity. The Bey says, ‘I always told the American consul he was a madman,’ (because I have not been his obsequious slave, as are half the consuls near him,) ‘and it appears the commanders of his nation are of the same opinion.’

“I am constrained, therefore, not less by a regard to the interest and honor of my country, than to my own individual interest and honor, to request the President will permit me to resign the trust I have the honor to hold under the government of the United States, unless more active operations shall be resolved on against the enemy; in which case it would gratify me to remain on this coast till the issue be determined.”

The Bey made new requisitions upon the United States. Through his minister he communicated to Eaton a formal demand of a frigate of thirty-six guns. The claim was of course resisted, and even the statement of it to the government declined. The Bey then determined to write with his own hand to the President of the United States; and, not satisfied with Eaton's pointed refusal to communicate his demand, attempted to gain the point by requesting him to make the form of a letter, which should be sent to the President under the Bey's own signature. According to Tunisian logic, this would have become the consul's own act, and therefore a promise. Eaton understood this perfectly well, and peremptorily refused. He argued, from the treaty compact, against the demand, and put the question pointedly to the minister if he was not ashamed to make it after having received lately such valuable presents from the United States. The minister replied, that the presents were a mere peace stipulation, the payment of which had long been delayed. He recapitulated the history of the negotiation, and concluded by insisting on the frigate as a token of the "veritable friendship of the prince of America."

The demand for a form of a letter was repeated to the drogoman, who had been instructed to reply, that the consul would write neither directly nor indirectly. This was not the last.

Again the minister demanded of Eaton, personally, the form of a letter, in still more imperious terms, but to no purpose. The consul was firm, and could not be frightened by the minister's menace, that the Bey would write in English himself; a menace which his Excellency would probably have found some difficulty in executing. The object of this requisition, as the Bey probably never supposed it would be complied with, must have been to provide a plausible pretext of a rupture with the United States, if circumstances should encourage a hope of plunder, or of greater concessions. The following is a translation of the letter, as it was finally written.

“Tunis, 8 September, 1802.

“The Bashaw, Bey of Tunis, to the President of the Republic of the United States of America.

“MR. PRESIDENT,

“With equal pleasure and satisfaction, I have seen arrive, and have received successively, all the military and naval stores, as well as the superb jewels, which your government has sent forward for my Regency and myself, in execution of our conditions for the confirming and consolidating of the good harmony and alliance, which, thank God, have been established and actually subsist between us.

“While I am happy to give you this assurance, indeed sincere, of my full contentment, I ought not to dissemble that I do not, at the same time, see myself treated with the same distinction and the same regard that you have had for your other friends ; and, since I am equally one, I avow to you, with frankness, as I have already declared to Mr. Eaton, your consul, that it would have been infinitely agreeable to me if you had also made me a present of a vessel of war.

“Mr. Eaton not finding it convenient to charge himself with the communication of this demand to you on my part, I am determined to testify to you directly, by the present, that it would be very agreeable to me that you should send me a good frigate of thirty-six guns, which would add to the high esteem I have for your nation, and would more and more cement the ties of our friendship, which on my part I shall maintain firm and inviolable.

“Convinced as I am beforehand, Mr. President, that this demand, taken into consideration, will obtain the full effect which I expect from it, I renew to you the assurance of my most distinguished esteem, and I pray Almighty God to have you in his holy keeping.

“HAMOUDA BASHAW BEY, “Prince of the Princes of Tunis, the City well guarded, the Abode of Happiness.”

Captain Murray, after reconsidering the consul's scheme, in relation to the exiled Bashaw, fell in with it so far as to offer to take him on board his ship, and convey him to Derne. This was contrary to Eaton's wishes, in the most important particulars. His object was to prevent the prince from resorting to that province, in order that he might appear before Tripoli with the American fleet. The Bashaw finally determined to leave Malta for Derne in an English brig. Eaton lamented this determination, as fatal not only to his own plans against the enemy, but as likely to expose the Bashaw himself to destruction. The conduct of the squadron was by no means satisfactory to the consul's ardent temperament. He regarded it as dilatory and inefficient, and extremely prejudicial to the interests of the United States. The blockade of Tripoli was but imperfectly maintained, and ships laden with provisions often succeeded in entering the harbor, and affording the enemy essential relief. Add to this, the Bey was becoming more haughty in his tone, and more insolent in his demands, apparently encouraged by the inactivity of the fleet. The imperious style of his letter to the President of the United States, Eaton regarded as an indication and expression of the contempt that potentate was encouraged to entertain for the character of the American nation. He then writes to the Secretary of State, under date of October 22d, 1802.

“The indignities I have suffered at this court latterly are insupportable. On the first appearance of our squadron, this Bey behaved respectfully; he has grown insolent in proportion to the moderation of their movements and the success of the enemy. I have in no instance yielded to his exactions. But, again permit me to repeat, without more energetic support I cannot maintain the position I have taken here; a position which has hitherto received the approbation of every distinguished officer of the general government with whom I have had the honor to correspond. And, suffer me to add, if further concessions are to be made here, I desire I may not be the medium through whom they shall be presented. The rich presents I have already given this Bey, in the name of the Chief Magistrate of the United States, serve only to show him our wealth and our weakness, and to prompt his avarice to new demands. Three years ago I apprehended this consequence of our yielding expressions of amity. The same effect will result from the same cause so long as the latter exist.”

Such being the state of things, Eaton determined to return to the United States. He felt assured, that he could render no important service to his government by a longer residence in Barbary; and he began to suspect, that the Bey of Tunis would not hesitate to seize and hold him in durance as a hostage, in case of a rupture with the Americans, for which he was supposed to be seeking a pretext. He was also desirous of repairing to the seat of government in person and settling his accounts; a step rendered necessary by the fact, that for many items he had no regular vouchers, and that the vouchers of others required explanation.

His measures with Hamet had involved an expense of about twenty-three thousand dollars, for which he had obtained the cash on credit in Tunis; and for the repayment of which it was necessary that immediate provision should be made. To meet this heavy expense, which was now regarded by him as useless, since the frustration of his plans, Eaton had no private resources. All his means had been exhausted by the rapacity and extortion of the horde of pirates, among whom the last few years had been spent. The Regency viewed him, as he supposed, with a jealous eye, and regarded him as an enemy to the Barbary interests.

At length Commodore Morris arrived at Tunis. The hostile temper of the Bey's government was not slow to show itself, in the conduct of its officers towards this commander. A dispute between him and the Bey's commercial agent determined the Commodore to leave the city without a formal visit to the court; but he was detained for the payment of the loan, above mentioned, which Eaton had negotiated with the commercial agent. The consul warmly remonstrated against this act of violence, insisting that he was alone responsible in his representative capacity. The plea was unavailing, and immediate payment was insisted on. The Commodore returned to the American house, and Eaton presented himself immediately to the Bey and inquired if this detention were by his order. He found there was no alternative, but that the Commodore would be compelled to satisfy the demand before he could obtain permission to embark. The French commissary-general engaged to advance the money on his bills on Leghorn; and Eaton proposed to execute an assignment of all his property in the United States, as a security to the Commodore, for the reimbursement of this sum, in case the contingent charges which occasioned the loan should not be admitted on final settlement with the government.

The next day, the Commodore, Mr. Cathcart, who had lately been appointed Mr. O'Brien's successor in Algiers, Captain Rogers, and Mr. Eaton, waited on the Bey at the palace. Eaton remonstrated with the Bey, in pointed terms, against the national indignity and breach of hospitality, in the detention of the Commodore, explained at large the means in his possession of meeting the debt, and declared that he had been hindered from a more seasonable payment, by the frauds of the minister, who had absolutely robbed him.

The Sapitapa was affronted, and charged Eaton with madness, and the Bey ordered him to quit the court. The consul replied, "It is well. I am not dissatisfied to quit a court where I have experienced little else than violence and indignity." The Bey said to the Commodore, "The consul is a man of a good heart but a wrong head. He is too obstinate and too violent for me. I must have a consul with a disposition more congenial to Barbary interests." He charged Eaton with violating the laws of the country, by bastinading his subjects. The chastisement of Famin was acknowledged. "But I denied," says Eaton, "that he was his subject, though I knew him to be his voluntary slave. His conduct towards me had merited chastisement; it had been treacherous, dishonest, and base. Finding no other means of justice, I had used the discipline, which I would again use in similar circumstances."

The Bey acknowledged, that Eaton had not, in his public agency, been wanting in any point of duty, or in respect to himself, as a prince. Eaton reiterated that he had suffered every species of outrage and insult in the Regency, and thanked the Bey for ordering him out of it; he should depart, at least with the consolation of leaving behind him the impression that he was not a slave. They parted with mutual expressions of regard, and Eaton left the court. Having made arrangements to intrust the affairs of the United States to the hands of Dr. George Davis of New York, he took passage on board the squadron, determined to repair, immediately on his arrival, to the seat of government, to render an account of his public services during the four years of his agency at Tunis.

CHAPTER X.

Eaton's Arrival in the United States. — Visit to Washington. — Passes the Summer in Brimfield. — Second Visit to Washington, and Attempt to settle his Accounts with the United States. — Letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. — Appointment as Navy Agent of the United States for the Barbary Powers. — Cautious Policy of the President. — Return to the Mediterranean and Arrival in Egypt. — Reception by the Viceroy. — Determination to join the Bashaw. — Arrested at the Turkish Lines. — Difficulties surmounted, and a Junction with the Bashaw effected. — Convention concluded between Eaton and Hamet.

MR. EATON accompanied the squadron to Gibraltar, where it arrived on the 23d of March, 1803. From thence, he took passage on board the merchant ship Perseverance, and arrived in Boston on the 5th of May, and immediately rejoined his family in Brimfield, from whom he had been separated four years and a half. Early in the summer he repaired to the seat of government, for the purpose of adjusting his accounts, and of urging the adoption of vigorous measures against Tripoli, particularly by employing the exiled Hamet against the reigning Bashaw. The settlement of a part of his accounts, requiring the action of Congress, was postponed to the next session, and Eaton returned to the quiet enjoyment of domestic life. The summer and autumn he devoted to the care of his family, the education of his children, and the management of his farm.

In January, 1804, he again repaired to Washington to complete his unfinished business with the government. The Department of State having refused to allow the twenty-two thousand dollars expended in concerting measures with the exiled Bashaw, and other smaller claims, Eaton addressed a long and able letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in which he recapitulated the most important transactions of his agency, explained the grounds on which his expenditures had been made, and went into an elaborate defence of his projected plan of attack on Tripoli. In this document, the character and policy of the Barbary regencies are drawn with extraordinary vigor, and the expediency of resisting their insolent demands, by an effectual display of military and naval force, is fully exhibited. With his usual vehemence, he does not hesitate to arraign before the Representatives of the nation, the conduct of the American commanders, who had opposed his plans. He defended his own character from the imputation of speculative views, which some of his opponents had thrown out against him, by a triumphant array of facts, exhibiting his disinterestedness, integrity, and honor.

During this period his leisure time was occupied with his domestic affairs. His private and family letters show in a pleasing light the affectionate zeal with which he devoted himself to the welfare of his children. Their education was a subject on which he felt the liveliest interest, and nothing was left undone, and no expense was spared to procure for them every advantage within his power to bestow.

In April of this year, Eaton was appointed Navy Agent of the United States for the Barbary powers. The exiled Bashaw had placed himself at the head of an army of Arabs at Derne, and had already gained some advantages in the field over the usurper. He proposed to the President of the United States such terms, as induced him to promise an effectual coöperation against the common enemy, the reigning Bashaw of Tripoli.

The President at first determined to send out, as a loan, some field artillery, a thousand stands of arms, and forty thousand dollars, and

Eaton undertook to lead in an enterprise for recovering the American captives in Tripoli, and imposing terms of peace on that Regency, by bringing a rival and an army upon the enemy's rear. But, before the squadron was ready to take its departure, information arrived that the Bashaw had retired to Alexandria, in Egypt, for want of supplies. This apparent reverse in the exile's fortunes checked the hopes of the administration, and the supplies were withheld. Eaton was ordered upon the expedition, without any special instructions, for himself or Commodore Barron, the commander-in-chief, who was intrusted with a general discretion in regard to co-operation, and referred in vague terms to Mr. Eaton, as the American agent for the Barbary regencies, and a man who was likely to be extremely useful. This cautious policy of the President was annoying and irritating to Eaton in the extreme. He regarded it as an attempt on the part of the Chief Magistrate to shield himself from responsibility if the enterprise should fail, and to secure the honor in case of success.

The situation of Eaton was embarrassing. He bore with him no evidence from the government of their friendly disposition towards the Bashaw. No alternative was left but to assume to himself the task and responsibility of convincing the exile and the world of the fidelity of the United States, though he was convinced, that the administration had been guilty of a breach of good faith. He was aware, moreover, that expectations had been formed by the American people, which his friends looked to him to fulfil. He was determined not to disappoint them, though he felt that the enterprise was forlorn and perilous. "I am convinced," he says in a letter, "that our captives cannot otherwise be released without ransom; and, as an individual, I would rather yield my person to the danger of war in almost any shape, than my pride to the humiliation of treating with a wretched pirate for the ransom of men, who are the rightful heirs of freedom."

Eaton embarked in June, on board the squadron destined for the Mediterranean, consisting of the frigates John Adams, the President, the Congress, the Essex, and the Constellation, under the command of Commodore Barron, and Captains Rogers, Barron, Campbell, and Chauncy. He arrived at Malta on the 5th of September, from which place he addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, in which he says, "The advantages calculated to result from a coöperation with him (the exiled Bashaw) seem not to have diminished in prospect from any occurrences, which have happened since these proposals were made. The reigning Bashaw persists in his demand of a ransom for our captives. But the distress, which must be occasioned by the means he is obliged to use in support of these pretensions, cannot but increase the discontent of his subjects, and ripen them for revolt. For such of them as subsist ordinarily, by cruising or commerce, being barred these resources by a harassing blockade; and such as depend on labor for subsistence, being compelled to serve for his defence without pay, will be very apt to seize an opportunity to relieve themselves from that distress, when it offers, on principles so consistent with their proper allegiance and religion. Those subjects, who were heretofore in the interests of the friendly Bashaw, are still so. Through these instruments, I firmly believe, the enemy may be taken from his sofa at the same instant that our fellow citizens are rescued from chains. The only obstacle, that seems to oppose the success of this measure, is want of supplies to put it in operation. These are not in the fleet; and the Commodore is not decided whether any construction of the President's instructions extends to a discretion of procuring and furnishing them. He will probably express himself on this subject after having fixed on his plan of operations."

The squadron arrived at Alexandria on the 25th of November, and the next day anchored in the port. On the 1st of December the adventurers entered the mouth of the Nile, and arrived at Grand Cairo on the 8th of the same month, and were received with many marks of respect by the Viceroy.

A war was raging in Egypt between the Mameluke Beys and the government of the Viceroy. The exiled Bashaw had been reduced by a series of disasters to the necessity of joining the former, and was at this time actually with them, commanding a few Tripolitans and other auxiliaries, and besieged in the village of Minyeh, in Upper Egypt. This state of things added further embarrassments to Eaton's operations, by making personal intercourse with the Bashaw difficult if not impossible. He was still farther harassed by the uncertainty of obtaining the Viceroy's firman for the Bashaw's departure, in case he should be detached from the army of the Mamélukes. He resolved, therefore, to throw himself on the honor and hospitality of the sovereign, without further delay. Accordingly he left the British consular house, accompanied by Captain Vincents, to whom he had brought letters from Sir Alexander Ball, the British Governor of Malta, and with Dr. Mandrici, an Italian, whom he had known at Tunis, to make a formal visit to the Viceroy, by appointment.

They were accompanied by a numerous es court, and preceded by lighted flambeaux and torches. The streets were lined with curious spectators, eager to get a sight of "the men who had come from the new world." They were received with great state and magnificence in a large and splendid hall. The Viceroy met them with dignity and affability, seated Eaton next himself, on a sofa of embroidered purple and damask cushions, and arranged the rest of the company on the right and left. After the customary ceremonies, and some conversation on indifferent topics, the court were directed to retire, leaving the Viceroy and his interpreter alone with his visitors. The occasion was seized by Eaton to make a full and candid explanation of his object. He gave a rapid sketch of the events which had led to the war with Tripoli, and of the negotiations with the exiled prince, adding many reflections, well adapted to flatter the pride and prejudices of his Excellency.

The Viceroy approved the plan, and promised his influence in promoting its success, with the reservation, however, that if the Bashaw should have joined the Mamelukes, it might change the dispositions he would otherwise make concerning him. It was replied, that an object of distress should not draw down the resentment of an exalted mind, and that it was more like God to pardon than to punish a repenting enemy. The Viceroy was pleased with this ingenious flattery, and assented. He promised to send couriers in search of Hamet, and no doubt was left that permission would be obtained for the embarkation of the Bashaw and his suite. The only embarrassment remaining, was the difficulty of withdrawing him from the Mamelukes without exciting suspicions, which would be fatal. The Viceroy immediately granted him a letter of amnesty, and permission to pass through the Turkish army unmolested. Eaton had already found at Cairo the prime minister, and one of the confidential governors, of Hamet Bashaw, in concert with whom he despatched secret couriers with the letter of amnesty and passport of safe conduct.

While waiting for the issue of these measures, he employed himself in finding out Tripolitan emigrants in Egypt, and ascertaining their feelings towards the rival brothers. A letter came from the Bashaw in answer to Eaton's first despatch from Cairo, informing him of a place which he had selected for an interview; but, as Eaton's subsequent letters had advised him to repair to the English house at Rosetta, under the guarantee of the Viceroy's passport, he determined to go thither himself. Receiving no intelligence on his arrival, he proceeded to Alexandria, and there received another letter informing him that the Bashaw adhered to his first solection of a place of interview, near lake Fayoum on the border of the desert, and about one hundred and ninety miles from the seacoast.

Eaton determined on attempting a journey thither, notwithstanding the hazards of travelling through a country exposed to all the horrors of civil war. Accordingly he left Alexandria, with two officers from the Argus, and an escort of twenty-three men, indifferently mounted; but had proceeded only about seventy or eighty miles on his route, when he found himself arrested at the Turkish lines. Circumstances were strong enough to excite the suspicions of a less vigilant commander than the general of the Ottoman troops, and it was not surprising, that a body of armed foreigners, shaping their course towards the enemy's rendezvous, and with no other ostensible object than to find a refugee Bashaw, should not be permitted to pass unmolested.

Their situation was extremely embarrassing. Eaton quieted the Turkish commander's suspicions by adroitly complimenting the correctness of his military conduct, and assuring him that, knowing his magnanimity, he was determined to have an interview, in full confidence that he would aid a measure, so humane, and so favorable to the Turkish interests in Egypt, even in case he would not permit him to pursue the object personally. To this was added, that he had it in charge to tender him a douceur, as a testimony of the exalted opinion entertained of his name and merits. The Turk was overcome. He called a young Arab chief to his tent, related to him the business, and asked him if he could give any account of Hamet. The young man exclaimed, that he knew all, and added, that twenty thousand Barbary Arabs were ready to march from the Egyptian border, to recover their native country and inheritance, and that he would pledge his head to the Turkish general to bring Hamet Bashaw in ten days.

He was accordingly despatched the next morning on this errand. The suspicions of the general were not yet wholly removed. He kept a vigilant eye upon the Americans, but extended to them every attention, dictated by politeness and hospitality. In a few days a messenger arrived from Hamet, with information that he was in the vicinity, accompanied only by his suite of about forty persons. The Turk's suspicions were now removed; he took Eaton by the hand, applauded his candor, and invited him to a dinner at his camp.

After joining the Bashaw, they proceeded to Alexandria; but the intrigues of the French consul, who represented the Americans as English spies in disguise, exposed them to new difficulties, by persuading the admiral of the port and governor of the city not to admit the Bashaw, nor suffer him to embark. The Bashaw's progress, however, was not much impeded; for, having resolved to march by land to Derne and Bengazi, he moved round Lake Moëris, and formed his camp at Arab's Tower, about thirty miles west of the old port of Alexandria. In the mean time Eaton informed the Viceroy of the contempt with which his letter of amnesty had been treated, upon which his Excellency forthwith addressed a firman to the governor, commanding immediate compliance, and imposing a fine of twenty-five thousand piastres.

Preparations were now making to take up the line of march through the Libyan desert. The party at present consisted of five hundred men, one hundred of whom were Christians recruited on the spot. They were to proceed to Bomba, and there await the arrival of Captain Hull, with supplies and reinforcements, which, it was supposed, would place them in a condition to make themselves masters of the provinces of Derne and Bergazi. To secure to the United States an indemnity for the expenses of this expedition, Eaton entered into a convention with Hamet Bashaw, by which the latter pledged the tribute of Sweden, Denmark, and the Batavian Republic.

CHAPTER XI.

Preparations to march across the Desert. — Difficulty with the Camel-Drivers. — March commenced. — Further Difficulties with the Arab Recruits. — Alarming Intelligence from Derne, and its Consequences. — Extracts from Eaton's Journal. — News of the Squadron at Derne. — March continued. — Arrival at Derne. — Battles with the Troops stationed there. — Overtures of Peace by the reigning Bashaw. — Negotiations concluded. — Derne evacuated. — Eaton's Return to the United States, and flattering Reception.

In March, 1805, the caravan was arranged at Arab's Tower, and the forces organized. The caravan consisted of one hundred and seven camels, and a few asses. The troops were, nine Americans, including Lieutenant O'Bannon, and Mr. Peck, a non-commissioned officer, and six private marines; a company of twenty-five cannoniers, commanded by Selim Comb, and Lieutenants Connant and Roco; a company of thirty-eight Greeks, commanded by Captain Luca Ul-ovix, and Lieutenant Constantine; the Bashaw's suite of about ninety men; a party of Arab cav alry; making the whole number about four hundred. Before the march began, the camel-drivers, fearing that, if they performed their services before being paid, the Christians would defraud them, refused to proceed. The Bashaw was irresolute; but Eaton ordered the Christians under arms, and, pretending a counter march, threatened to abandon the expedition, unless they advanced without delay. This measure was effectual, and the mutiny was suppressed. A few days after the march commenced, a courier from Derne met the Bashaw, and informed him that the province had taken up arms in his cause. This good news produced demonstrations of joy among the advanced troops, which proved nearly fatal to the Christians who were escorting the caravan. The foot forces of the Arabs, hearing the fire, and thinking that an attack had been made by the wild Arabs of the desert, were only prevented by the prudence of one of their companions from disarming the Christians and putting them to death.

On arriving at a castle, called by the Arabs Masroscab, Eaton learned, for the first time, that the caravan had been freighted by the Bashaw only to this place, and that the owners had received no part of their pay. They refused to proceed to Bomba, or to wait for the money, alleging that their engagement with the Bashaw was already fulfilled. They were promised payment on condition of proceeding two days further, to which they finally assented. Eaton raised among his men a sufficient supply of money, added to what the Bashaw procured from his followers, to pay off the caravan; which being done, instead of performing their engagement, they deserted, and turned their steps towards Egypt.

A plot was discovered among some of the Arab chiefs to proceed no farther, until assurance was received that the American vessels had arrived at Bomba; a report having been put in circulation, that a body of eight hundred cavalry, and large foot forces, were on their march from Tripoli, for the defence of Derne. A resolution was finally taken, without consulting the commander, to remain on the spot, until a runner should go to Derne and return. Eaton immediately ordered their rations to be stopped. He resolved to seize the castle and fortify himself there, until relief could be procured from the squadron, and to draw off the Christians, leaving the Arabs to devise the means of their own subsistence and safety. This decided conduct had the effect of bringing back a part of the insurgents, who agreed to proceed two days further.

On the 26th of March, a courier brought intelligence from Derne, that five hundred of the reigning Bashaw's cavalry, accompanied by great numbers of Arabs, were but a few days' march from that place. This information produced great alarm in the camp; the Bashaw hesitated about proceeding further; the camel-drivers fled with their caravan, and the Arabs seemed determined to return to Fayoum. One of the principal chiefs, the Sheik el Tahib, refused to advance without certain intelligence of the American squadron at Bomba. Eaton reproached him with want of courage and fidelity. He left the camp in a rage, swearing that he would join them no more, and carried with him a small detachment of his tribe. The Bashaw was anxious to recall him, but Eaton refused to ask as a favor, what he claimed as a right, and immediately issued orders to march.

The Sheik, finding the commander was inflexible to threats, came back with his whole party. The following extracts from Eaton's Journal, show with what difficulties his progress through the desert was beset.

"March 28th. I perceived a manifest reluctance in the Bashaw to advance, and evident calculations for a retrograde march. Joseph Bashaw's forces had seized on all his nerves. He now took from my officers the horses he had given them for the passage through the desert, and gave them to some of his footmen ; drew off his Mahometans, and stood balancing, after the troops were drawn up for the march. I reproached him with indecision, want of perseverance, and of consistency in arrangement. I demanded the horses for my officers. High words ensued. I ordered the march in front. The Bashaw retrograded. We proceeded in front with the baggage. The Bashaw came up in about two hours ; and, making us some compliments for our firmness, said he was obliged to dissemble an acquiescence in the wishes of his people to render them manageable. We proceeded twelve miles and a half to a castle Shemees, and camped at one o'clock, P. M. In the evening, discovered that the Arabs, who had joined us on the 25th, and who, as we expected, were following us, had all taken up their march for the borders of Egypt. The Sheik el Tahib had discouraged and dissuaded them from pursuing the expedition. The Bashaw sent off a general officer with sundry horsemen to bring them back by persuasion.

“Hamet Gurgies, the officer who went for the Arabs, did not return this day.

“March 29th. Remained in camp, waiting for Hamet Gurgies. At this castle, which is a rough stone wall, laid in clay mortar, about ten feet high, without bastions, and one hundred feet square, there seems to be some trade with the inhabitants of the interior of Africa. We find here cattle, sheep, butter, fowls, eggs, and dates, but very dear; and for which we bartered rice at great disadvantage. The situation is enchanting; vast plains, capable of high cultivation; good well water, and some enclosed gardens of fig and palm trees. But every thing bears the ruinous aspect of ravage and war. About four P. M., Hamet Gurgies came up with the Arabs, who separated themselves from us on the 27th.

“March 30th. At six, A. M. resumed our march with the Christians and baggage, leaving the Bashaw to follow with his Arabs, who were mounted for the purpose. At this instant a dispute arose between the Sheik el Tahib and Sheik Mahamet, concerning the distribution of one thousand five hundred dollars, which the former had received of the Bashaw to be equally distributed, a part of which he had concealed; and grew so warm that Hamet swore he would proceed no farther. Three other Sheiks and several other considerable Arabs took part with him, and retrograded. The Bashaw in vain endeavored to reconcile the parties. Sheik Mahamet persisted in quitting the expedition, and with his party moved rapidly off. The Bashaw left them, and hastily pursued us, with a view of arresting our march, having sent back Hamet Gurgies and two other officers to endeavor to recover the malecontents. We had gained fifteen miles ahead, when he came up with us at two o'clock, P. M. But it was necessary to retrograde three miles to water, and there encamp. The expedition could not proceed without those chiefs, as they had many people and powerful influence with the Eu ed alli tribe near Derne, to which they belong."

At five o'clock in the afternoon they encamped. The Bashaw, with twelve horsemen and the interpreter, returned to the castle, intending if possible to reconcile the Sheiks and bring up their party. This caused a new delay.

"From Alexandria to this place," says Eaton in his Journal, "we have experienced continual altercations, contentions, and delays among the Arabs. They have no sense of patriotism, truth, or honor; and no attachment where they have no prospect of gain, except to their religion, to which they are enthusiasts. Poverty makes them thieves, and practice renders them adroit in stealing. The instant the eye of vigilance is turned from an object on which they have fixed a desire, it is no more to be found. Arms, ammunition, and provisions most engage their furtive speculations; but sundry of our people have been robbed of their clothes and other articles. With all their depravity of morals they possess a savage independence of soul, an incorrigible obstinacy to discipline, a sacred adherence to the laws of hospitality, and a scrupulous pertinacity to their religious faith and ceremonies. Day before yesterday I was admitted, as a mark of special distinction, within the walls of their castle. Curiosity brought every Arab about me who belonged to the tribe. They examined the lace of my hat, epaulettes, buttons, spurs, and mounting of my arms. These they took to be all gold and silver. They were astonished, that God should permit people to possess such riches, who followed the religion of the Devil!”

The interpreter undertook to explain to them that the religion of the American people differed from that of other nations who wore hats,—this being, in the eyes of the Arabs, the distinguishing mark of a Christian. He told them that they believed in God, and respected all his revelations, but made no distinction between the believers in different creeds; a statement, that puzzled them not a little. They had heard, however, that Eaton was a good man and a great friend of the Musselmans, and lamented, that, being an infidel, he must unquestionably be damned. They urged him to secure his admission to Mahomet's paradise by repeating after them a simple formulary, implying that Mahomet was the prophet of God. He replied, that the Americans were promised a heaven distinct from that of the Papists and Musselmans, but that all good men would be admitted to it, and excursions would be allowed into the paradise of Mahomet and the heaven of the Pope. He told them that he was assured himself of a civil reception by those opposite prophets, inasmuch as he had many friends among the followers of both. They smiled at this representation, but confessed they should be glad to see him in their paradise, though they had some doubts whether Mahomet would allow him to come even on a visit, unless he professed his religion and became a true believer.

The Journal continues, "April 1st. Sheik el Tahib put himself at the head of five Sheiks, three of whom were of the caravan, and presented himself at my marquee, to demand an augmentation of the ration. I refused. He menaced. I reproached him as the cause of all our delays in the march, and with a total failure of all his engagements with me. He had engaged me four hundred mounted Arabs of his tribe at the Marabout, and to bring me to Bomba in fourteen days. His whole number of men consisted of but twenty-eight; we had now been twenty-five days in gaining half our distance; and, instead of encouraging our progress, he was on all occasions throwing obstacles in our way. He recriminated the Bashaw and other Sheiks. I thought the Bashaw and Sheiks he accused were better men than himself; and would not hear them calumniated. He believed me partial. I said to him, if he had experienced any evidence of my partiality, it was in his favor until after his hypocrisy betrayed itself. It was true I now held him in no consideration, for I could place no reliance in anything he said or undertook. He seemed very indifferent about the opinion I entertained of him, provided he could obtain his object. He cautioned me against persisting in the resolution I had taken not to augment the ration; it would unavoidably produce an insurrection. The other Sheiks and caravan would leave me. As for himself, he could not subsist on rice alone; he would have bread also. I asked him if he thought to compel the measure. He said, with a menacing tone, ‘Remember you are in a desert, and a country not your own. I am a greater man here, than either you or the Bashaw.’ I retorted; ‘I have found you at the head of every commotion, which has happened since we left Alexandria. You are the instigator of the present among the chiefs. Leave my tent! but mark; if I find a mutiny in camp during the absence of the Bashaw, I will put you to instant death as the fomentor of it.’ He left the tent; mounted his horse; and, with two other Sheiks, took himself off. The Bashaw's hasnadar (treasurer) had been called into my tent on the entrance of the Sheik el Tahib. He had the influence to pacify the other chiefs, or to engage them to wait at least till the return of the Bashaw. At two o'clock the Sheik el Tahib returned; entered into the tent of my officers; regretted that he had lost my confidence; apprehended that some secret enemy had insinuated unfavorable impressions against him; was devoted to me; would even abandon the Bashaw to follow me; and begged Messrs. Farquhar and Peck to use their influence for a reconciliation.

"At five o'clock he came to my tent; professed eternal obligations and attachment; would seek every occasion to give proofs of it; and hoped that an opportunity would offer to him at Derne to convince me that he was a man!

"I replied, that I required nothing of him by way of reconciliation, but truth, fidelity to the Bashaw, pacific conduct among the other chiefs, uniformity and perseverance in this conduct. These he promised by an oath; and offered me his hand."

"Visited the Arab camp. Their young men, young women, and children are perfectly well made, and though copper-colored, are handsome. Never saw teeth so universally sound and white, even, and well set. The women do not veil; have nothing of the affected reserve and bigoted pride of the Turks; yet in their general deportment modest and bashful. I took dates in the tent of their principal Sheikh; one of his wives served them in an osier panner, and seemed elated with the visit. I complimented her elegant proportion and symmetry. She smiled, and said there were much handsomer young women in camp than herself. I doubted it. To give me proof, sundry fine girls and young married women were invited in. I admitted they were very handsome, but could not give up my first opinion."

On the 2d of April, the Bashaw returned with the Sheiks, who had left the party a few days before. He had overtaken them, at a distance of fifty-nine miles on the route to the province of Bahara, after riding all night and the following day, exposed to a fall of rain and severe winds, and subsisting on milk and dates, which were occasionally supplied by the Arabs of the desert.

The evening of the same day Eaton held a meeting of the Bashaw and all the Sheiks at his tent, and urged upon them the importance of union and perseverance to insure the success of the enterprise in which they were engaged. They listened to his representations and pledged their honor to abide by his counsels ; and orders were accordingly given to resume the march at the beat of the reveillee next morning. The whole number of effective men on the ground was found to be between six and seven hundred, exclusive of camp followers and Bedouin families. The movements of the following day are thus detailed.

“ April 3d. Marched at six, A. M. Advanced only ten miles in front, when the Arabs pitched their camp and insisted on remaining here until they could send a caravan five days’ march into the interior of the desert, to a place called Seewauk to procure dates. We were in a valley upon the centre of a vast elevated plain, and had excellent cistern water. I urged the march ahead. The Arabs positively refused to proceed. They were short of provisions, and had no other resort. I said those wants would be supplied at Bomba. They replied, that this depended on contingency ; we could not command the sea. I threatened to take off the Christians. They entreated I would halt till the next morning. To this I consented on condition, that they would solemnly promise to throw no more impediments in the way of our progress to Bomba, and that they would hereafter yield implicit obedience to my orders ; threatening at the same time to embark with the Bashaw and his suite at that place, and proceed directly to Tripoli, leaving them to contend for the provinces of Derne and Bengazi alone, in case of any infraction of these conditions. They pledged themselves; and we encamped. Their caravan went off for Seewauk, to join us again at Bomba."

The following extract contains a still more striking picture.

"April 8th. Marched at six, A. M. Descended the western declivity of the mountain. At nine called a halt near a cistern of excellent rain water, excavated in a solid rock, at the bottom of a deep ravine, by the torrents of water and small stones which rush down the mountain by this avenue during the rainy season. This was a precious repast to our thirsty pilgrims. I went with a small party to survey the seacoast and reconnoitre the country, intending to pursue the march as soon as the army should have refreshed themselves. But, during my absence, the Bashaw ordered the camps pitched. On my return I demanded his reason for so doing. He answered, that the exhausted situation of the troops and people required at least one day's repose. I discovered, however, that his real intention was to remain on this ground until a courier should return, which he was about to despatch to Bomba in quest of our vessels. We had only six days' rations of rice; no bread nor meat, and no small rations. I urged this circumstance as an impulsive reason why the march should continue. He said the Arab chiefs were resolved to proceed no farther till the camp should have recruited themselves by a little repose. I told him, if they preferred famine to fatigue, they might have the choice; and ordered their rations stopped. The day passed confusedly among them. At three, P. M. the Bashaw, compelled by his Arab host, struck his tent, ordered his baggage packed, mounted, and took up a march for Fiaume by the mountain. I waited without emotion the result of this movement, not choosing to betray a concern for ourselves. Discovering, however, an intention in the Arabs to seize our provisions, I beat to arms. My Christians formed a line in front of the magazine tent. Each party held an opposite position for the space of an hour. The Bashaw prevailed on the Arabs to return; they dismounted; and he pitched his tent.

"Supposing the tumult tranquillized, I ordered the troops to pass the manual exercise, according to our daily practice. In an instant the Arabs took an alarm; re-mounted, and exclaimed, 'The Christians are preparing to fire on us!' The Bashaw mounted and put himself at their head, apparently impressed with the same apprehension.

A body of about two hundred advanced in full charge upon our people, who stood their ground motionless. The enemy withdrew at a small distance, singled out the officers, and, with deliberate aim, cried, — Fire! Some of the Bashaw's officers exclaimed, 'For God's sake do not fire! The Christians are our friends.' Mr. O'Bannon, Mr. Peck, and young Farquhar, stood firmly by me. Selem Aga, (captain of cannoniers,) his lieutenants, and the two Greek officers, remained steadfast at their post. The others were agitated, and in fact abandoned us. I advanced towards the Bashaw and cautioned him against giving countenance to a desperate act. At once a column of muskets were aimed at my breast. The Bashaw was distracted. A universal clamor drowned my voice. I waved my hand as a signal for attention. At this critical moment some of the Bashaw's officers and sundry Arab chiefs rode between us with drawn sabres and repelled the mutineers. I reproached the Bashaw for his rashness, or rather weakness. His hasnadar asked him if he was in his senses. The Bashaw struck him with his naked sabre. The fracas had nearly resumed its rage, when I took the Bashaw by the arm, led him from the crowd, and asked him if he knew his own interests and his friends! He relented; called me his friend and protector; said he was too soon heated ; and followed me to my tent, giving orders at the same time to his Arabs to disperse. After a moment's breath, he said, if I would give orders to issue rice, it would quiet every thing. This I would not do on any other condition than his promise to march to-morrow morning at reveillee beating. He promised, and provisions were issued. Confessions of obligation and professions of attachment were repeated as usual on the part of the Bashaw and his officers ; and the camp again resumed its tranquillity. The firm and decided conduct of Mr. O'Bannon, as on all other occasions, did much to deter the violence of the savages by whom we were surrounded, as well as to support our own dignity and character. After the affair was over, the Bashaw embraced him with an enthusiasm of respect, calling him the brave American. The Chevalier Davies, my aid-de-camp, acted a part which I would rather attribute to an amiable disposition than to weakness of nerve. My doctor behaved decidedly like a coward, and a base one. Mr. Farquhar conducted with manly firmness. One of the Arabs, during the agitation, snapped a pistol at his breast. Happily it missed fire ; had it been otherwise, the fire would most probably have become general and the result serious.

“ We find it almost impossible to inspire these wild bigots with confidence in us, or to persuade them, that, being Christians, we can be otherwise than enemies to Mussulmans. We have a difficult undertaking."

The Bashaw continued to show signs of distrust. It had been intimated to him, that the Americans designed to use him only for the purpose of obtaining a peace with his brother, and the intimation filled him with alarm. How much ground existed for this suspicion will appear in the sequel. A council of war was held on the 10th of April, and an insurmountable reluctance was manifested, on the part of the Arabs, and some of the Bashaw's people, to proceeding further without intelligence of the squadron. Eaton was forced to yield, and agreed to halt after two days' further march.

Happily the courier, who had been despatched to Bomba, arrived the same evening, with information that the vessels were off that place and Derne. In an instant the gloom and discontent were changed to enthusiastic rejoicings. The Arabs resumed their confidence, and the Bashaw promised to force the remainder of the march to Bomba. In five days more, having endured great hardship from want of provisions and water, they reached that long desired port; but Eaton was astonished to find there no trace of a human being, and no indications of the vessels. The Arabs became outrageous and abusive, and resolved to depart the next morning. Eaton proposed to attempt reaching Derne, but it was thought impracticable. Finally, he drew off with his Christian followers, and kept up fires on a mountain in the rear all night. At eight the next morning the discovery of a sail spread joy and exultation through the camp.

It proved to be the Argus. Captain Hull had seen the fires and stood in. Provisions were sent ashore for the suffering troops. The next day the sloop Hornet arrived, with a still further supply. The army passed three days in refreshing themselves after their weary march, and making preparations for continuing it to Derne. Their journey was resumed on the 23d, and they now began to approach cultivated fields. Measures were taken to prevent pillage. A herald proclaimed throughout the camp, "He who fears God and feels attachment to Hamet Bashaw, will be careful to destroy nothing. Let no one touch the growing harvest. He who transgresses this injunction shall lose his right hand." On the 24th they encamped in a pleasant valley, about five hours' march from Derne. Information was received, that the governor had taken his position, and was determined to defend the city, and that the army of the reigning Bashaw was in the neighborhood, and would probably, by a forced march, arrive at Derne first.

The Arabs were again alarmed, and the Bashaw desponded. The next morning, when orders were given to march, the Arabs mutinied, and the Bedouins refused to strike their tents. By persuasions, reproaches, and the promise of two thousand dollars to be shared among the chiefs, they were prevailed on to advance, and the same afternoon the camp was pitched on an eminence overlooking Derne, from which the place was reconnoitred. The governor's defence was found to consist of a water battery of eight nine pounders towards the northeast, a few temporary breastworks and walls of old buildings on the southeast; and on the front of the bay, about one third of the inhabitants, in the interest of the reigning Bashaw, had provided their terraces and the walls of their houses with loopholes. The governor had also mounted a howitzer on the terrace of his palace. Several Sheiks came out in the evening to visit the Bashaw, and assured him, that the remaining two thirds of the inhabitants were loyal to his person, but that, as the governor could bring eight hundred men into the field, and was master of all the batteries, the breastworks, and the seaboard, it would be difficult to dislodge him.

The next day the Nautilus came in sight, and the Argus and Hornet the day after. On his first arrival, Eaton had sent in to the governor a flag of truce, which was returned, with the laconic answer, "My head or yours." The morning of the 27th, the army was put in motion towards the city. The Nautilus and Hornet approached the shore, and one of the field-pieces was drawn up the precipice. The troops advanced to their positions, and a fire commenced on the shipping, which was returned by Lieutenant Evans, who stood in and anchored within a hundred yards of the battery, and by Lieutenant Dent, who had taken a position, from which he brought his guns to bear on the battery and the city. Captain Hull anchored the Argus near enough to throw a twenty-four pound shot into the town. A detachment of six American marines, a company of twenty-four canoniers, another of thirty-six Greeks, under the command of Lieutenant O'Bannon, with a few Arabs, occupied a position opposite the enemy, who had taken post behind their temporary parapets at the southeast quarter of the town. The Bashaw seized a castle overlooking the town on the south-southeast, and posted his cavalry on the plain in the rear. The firing became general before two o'clock, wherever Americans and Tripolitans were opposed. The battery was silenced in three quarters of an hour and most of the enemy precipitately withdrew from that quarter to reinforce the party opposed to Eaton and his handful of men. The fire of the fieldpiece being slackened by the loss of the rammer, and the discharge of the enemy's musketry continually increasing, the troops were thrown into confusion, and it was impossible to reduce them to order. Eaton was convinced that a charge was the last resort, and accordingly rushed with his men against a body of the enemy ten times his number. They fled, keeping up an irregular fire from the palm trees and walls in their way.

At this moment Eaton received a ball through his left wrist, which disabled him from using his rifle. Mr. O'Bannon pressed on with his marines, the Greeks, and as many of the cannoniers as could be spared from the fieldpiece. They passed through a shower of musketry, took possession of the battery, and planted the American flag on its ramparts. The guns were turned upon the enemy, who were driven from their outposts, and took refuge in the houses, from which they were speedily dislodged by a heavy and well directed fire poured into them from the vessels. The Bashaw took possession of the governor's palace, and a little after four o'clock the troops had entire possession of the town, the battle having raged about two hours and a half.

The governor took sanctuary in the harem of an old Sheik, in a division of the city favorable to the Bashaw. He was demanded of the aged chief; but neither persuasion, bribes, nor menace could overcome his determination not to suffer the hospitality of his house to be violated. He declared, that, whatever might be the weakness or crimes of the Arabs, no instance was known among them of giving up a fugitive to whom they had once accorded their protection; and, should he transgress that sacred principle, the vengeance of God, and the odium of all mankind, would justly fix on him and his posterity. Finding that the governor, Mustapha Bey, though shut up in his sanctuary, was an active, intriguing, and dangerous enemy, Eaton determined to seize him by force; but the demonstrations of resistance, even among the friendly inhabitants, were so unequivocal, that he soon found it prudent to desist from the attempt. "The Christians no longer respect the customs of our fathers and the laws of hospitality," was the universal outcry, and all Eaton's arguments were unavailing. That night the Sheik aided the governor to escape to the enemy's camp, with a retinue of fifteen or sixteen Turks.

Five or six days were employed in putting themselves in as good a state of defence, as the means they possessed rendered possible. Eaton took up his post in the battery, raised parapets, and mounted guns, to be prepared for all events. The moment of gaining Derne was peculiarly fortunate, as the army, sent from Tripoli for its defence, was less than three days' march distant on the day of the attack.

Contrary to Eaton's expectations, the Tripolitan troops, being joined by the governor of Derne, advanced upon the town and offered battle. An engagement took place on the 13th of May. The enemy attacked a detachment of about one hundred of Hamet's cavalry, who were posted a mile from the town. The detachment was overpowered by superior numbers, and pursued into the city, and almost to the palace held by the Bashaw, whose supporters opened upon the pursuers a warm fire of musketry. The guns from the Argus and Nautilus, and from the battery, together with the field-pieces, were kept in continual action; but, such an obstinate determination to seize the person of the Bashaw was manifested, that Eaton began to fear the day was lost. Not being able to make a sortie for the Bashaw's relief, on account of the weakness of his post, he turned his guns upon the town, and a shot from one of the nine-pounders killing two of the enemy near the palace a retreat was instantly sounded, the town was abandoned at all points, and the enemy were pursued by Hamet's cavalry, under the shot of the vessels, which galled them severely in their flight. Before three o'clock in the afternoon, the city was reduced to tranquillity, and the enemy were to be seen only on the neighboring heights. The loss of the Tripolitans was twenty-eight men killed and fifty-six wounded. Of the Bashaw's troops, the killed and wounded amounted only to twelve or fourteen.

In the following days several attempts were made by the Tripolitans to renew the assault. They endeavored to collect camels for the security of their front and flanks, and surrounded their camp with parapets. But the Arabs were afraid to advance within reach of the cannon, and refused to use their camels as breastworks. Eaton was desirous of attacking their position by a coup de main; but circumstances prevented the attempt. The enemy continued to show themselves in a menacing attitude. A company of fifty or sixty foot, covered by a troop of horse, fell upon several Arab families, who were encamped in the rear of the town, and drove off cattle and camels. They were pursued, three of them were killed and wounded, and the plunder was retaken. Eaton marched out from the garrison with a small detachment, with a view of cutting off their retreat. They made but a momentary resistance, and fled before a charge of the bayonet. Their captain and five men were killed, and two taken prisoners. The enemy's camp beat to arms, moved towards the pursuing party in a body, but did not approach within musket-shot, fearing to be drawn into an ambuscade.

The next morning they resolved to avenge themselves by an attack, advanced with their whole force, and took post on an eminence in full view of the town. Preparations were made to receive them ; but, when orders were given for the attack, the Arabs mutinied and marched off, and the Tripolitans were compelled to follow them. On the 2d of June another attempt was made with similar success. The Arabs refused to advance, alleging, that they were willing to fight an enemy in their own mode of warfare, but would have nothing to do with Americans, who fired enormous balls, that carried away men and camels together, or rushed on them with bayonets, without giving them time to load their muskets. Another attack was feigned the following day, which was repelled with loss. On the 11th of June, the enemy, having received fresh reinforcements of Arabs, appeared on the heights that overlooked the town, but seemed irresolute. There was only one pass through the steep and rough ledge of rocks, on the side of the mountain, through which cavalry could descend. About half way between this pass and the town, the Bashaw had posted a small body of cavalry to serve as videttes. A large detachment of the enemy descended the pass to cut off the post, but were resisted and repelled. Small reinforcements came up on both sides, until the battle became general. The Argus annoyed them with her shot, whenever they were uncovered from the ridges, and one of the fieldpieces was occasionally brought to bear on them from the advanced battery. The action lasted four hours, when the enemy gave way and were chased back to the pass in the mountain, and many of their horses were left in the hands of the victors. The number of the Bashaw's killed and wounded was between fifty and sixty; the enemy lost between forty and fifty killed, and had upwards of seventy wounded. The battle was fought chiefly under the direction of the Bashaw. Eaton had doubts whether he should be justified in continuing offensive operations, for reasons which will appear in what is about to be related.

Colonel Tobias Lear had been appointed consul-general of the United States at Algiers, and commissioner to negotiate a peace with Tripoli. He was instructed to act under the advice of

Commodore Barron, commander of the American forces in the Mediterranean, as to the selection of a favorable moment to open the negotiation. That moment had now arrived, in the opinion of the commodore, and he hastened to communicate this opinion to the consul. Accordingly he repaired to Tripoli in the United States frigate Essex, and opened a communication with the Bashaw. The Bashaw demanded two hundred thousand dollars for peace and ransom, the delivery of all the Tripolitans, and the restoration of their property. These terms were rejected at once, and the ultimatum proposed was a mutual delivery of prisoners; and, as the Bashaw held about two hundred more than the Americans, the payment of sixty thousand dollars for their ransom. To prevent fruitless altercation, the consul refused to go on shore until these terms were formally acceded to. On the 3d of June the preliminaries were completed, and sent off to the Essex, with the Bashaw's seal. The consul immediately went on shore, and the officers and crew of the frigate Philadelphia, who were held in captivity, were immediately set at liberty. The bravery of the Americans at Derne, and the idea that they had a large force and abundant supplies at that place, had made a strong impression on the Bashaw. The consul took advantage of this impression, and endeavored to make an arrangement favorable to the exile; but he could only persuade the Bashaw to engage, that, if his brother would withdraw peaceably from his dominions, his wife and children should be restored to him.

These facts were speedily communicated to Eaton, with orders to evacuate Derne, agreeably to the articles of stipulation between Mr. Lear and the Bashaw of Tripoli, by Commodore Rogers, who had succeeded Commodore Barron in the command of the squadron. The information filled Eaton with disappointment and indignation. He had looked forward with enthusiastic ardor to the prospect of driving the usurper from his throne, reinstating the exiled brother, and setting the American captives free, without conditions and without ransom. He anticipated with pride, that by his means and through his agency the United States would inflict a signal chastisement on an unprincipled usurper and pirate, and teach the other regencies a lesson of respect for the American name, which they would not be likely soon to forget. He felt, moreover, that the honor of the country was pledged to the cause of Hamet Caramelli, and that to desert him at this period, when perfect success seemed on the point of crowning the enterprise, would justly expose the American people to the charge of selfishness and bad faith.

It would show a disposition on their part to use the unfortunate exile so far as his influence and his name promoted their own interests, by holding up the delusive expectation of coöperation to the end; but, the moment the reigning Bashaw should be frightened into the acceptance of moderate terms of peace, to leave the unhappy prince to his fate. It was seen, that his condition would now be worse, than if the enterprise had never been attempted.

The terms on which peace was concluded met Eaton's decided reprobation. The payment of sixty thousand dollars for the prisoners of war, "but not a cent for peace," he regarded as an insult to the understanding of the people; because, he very justly argued, the capital of the largest province in the Bashaw's dominions, containing twelve or fifteen thousand inhabitants, was in the possession of the Americans, and the enemy despaired of recovering it by force of arms. So far, therefore, from not paying a cent for peace, a kingdom had been surrendered to secure it, a concession which he pronounced needless and prodigal.

Eaton's representations were unavailing, and he was obliged to comply. His situation was certainly embarrassing, and, to a man of his ardent temperament, mortifying in the extreme. Perhaps his own wishes led him to attribute more meaning to his instructions from the commanders in the squadron, than an unprejudiced reader would discover there. Certain it is, he had no idea, that the Bashaw was to be used merely as an instrument of bringing about a peace with the usurper; and, when Hamet had been alarmed by an insinuation to that effect, in the early part of the march across the desert, he took the greatest pains to do it away. There can be no doubt, that his anticipations of success in an attack on Tripoli would have been completely fulfilled. The victories already gained, the popularity of Hamet's cause, the hatred of the people for the tyrannical usurper, the distress caused by the blockade, and the wholesome terror inspired by the exploits of the American arms by sea and land, held out every prospect of entire success.

Such being the state of things, it must be admitted, that Mr. Lear was too precipitate in his overtures. The least he was justified in demanding was an unconditional surrender of all American prisoners, a peace on the terms of the most favored nations, and stipulations for the entire security of Hamet and his followers, under the guarantee of the United States. The Bashaw would have been forced to yield every one of these demands, or, if he refused, the Americans would have been fully justified in marching upon his capital, and driving him from his throne. The payment of the money was adding another link to the long chain of disgraceful concessions made by Christian nations to the exactions of the Barbary pirates.

That the Americans were bound to proceed with Hamet at all events, is more than can fairly be asserted; on the contrary, it seems evident, that they were bound to accept an honorable peace, whenever the reigning Bashaw saw fit to propose it. They had nothing to do with the fact of his being a usurper; he had been the recognised sovereign of Tripoli, and diplomatic agents from the United States had been received and acknowledged at his court. To interfere, then, in the internal affairs of the kingdom, by assuming an arbitration upon the claims of two rivals contending for the throne, might, with some appearance of justice, have been condemned in the eyes of the world as a departure from the usages of nations, and an unwarrantable violation of the principles that regulate the intercourse of sovereign states.

The despatches of Mr. Lear and Commodore Rogers were communicated by Captain Campbell, of the frigate Constellation, who informed Eaton, that he had been instructed by the commander of the squadron, to receive the garrison on board his ship. On the 11th of June, the captain went on shore, and was accompanied by Eaton to the town. The Bashaw was immediately informed of the peace concluded between the United States and his brother, and the stipulation, that his family should be restored to him on condition of his withdrawing quietly from the kingdom. He was alarmed at the danger of his situation, and said, that his only hope of safety was in leaving the country with them; and even this would be impossible for him, and hazardous to them, if the project should transpire before it was carried into effect. Eaton therefore kept up the idea of an attack on the enemy, which was the more easily done, in consequence of a report put in circulation, that a reinforcement had arrived in the frigate for this very purpose. Ammunition and extra rations were ordered to be distributed among the Moorish and Arab troops, and spies were despatched to ascertain the enemy's position. The garrison were inspected and directed to hold themselves in readiness to advance. At eight o'clock in the evening patrols were stationed to stop all intercourse between the town and the port, occupied by the Americans. In the mean time the boats of the Constellation were laid along side the wharf, and the captain of the cannoniers was ordered to embark his company first, and after them the Greeks.

This manœuvre was executed with promptness and silence, and a messenger was despatched to the Bashaw requesting an interview. He immediately came with his retinue, and embarked in the boats. The marines and American officers followed. When all were fairly off, Eaton stepped into a small boat, and had just time to get to a safe distance from the shore, when the alarmed soldiery and populace crowded to the camp, the battery, and the coast, with cries of terror and bursts of execration. The tents and horses that were left were seized, and preparations were immediately made for flight. The garrison, with the Bashaw and his suite, were on board the Constellation about two o'clock in the morning, and, before daybreak, the Arabs, and such inhabitants of the town as were able to make their escape, fled to the mountains.

In the morning, a messenger from Tripoli went ashore under a flag of truce, carrying letters of amnesty from the reigning Bashaw to the people of Derne, on condition of their returning to their allegiance. They rejected his offer of pardon, declaring, that they knew the Bashaw's perfidy too well to be ensnared by it, and were resolved to defend themselves, to the last moment, against his troops. "In a few minutes more," says Eaton, writing on board the Constellation, "we shall lose sight of this devoted city, which has experienced as strange a reverse, in so short a time, as was ever recorded in the disasters of war, thrown from proud success and elevated prospects into an abyss of hopeless wretchedness. Six hours ago, the enemy were seeking safety from them by flight; this moment we drop them from ours into the hands of the enemy, for no other crime but too much confidence in us. The man, whose fortunes we have followed thus far, experiences a reverse as striking. He falls, from the most flattering prospects of a kingdom, to beggary."

The duties annexed to Eaton's appointment as Navy Agent of the United States, having ceased with the war, he requested of Commodore Rogers to grant him a passage in the first ship that should be sent home from his squadron. He arrived at Syracuse towards the end of June, where he was detained some time in settling the business growing out of the expedition to Derne, which caused him some trouble and perplexity. He endeavored to prevail on Hamet, who was with him at Syracuse, to accompany him to the United States, but unsuccessfully. The unfortunate man determined to remain for the present, in the hope of making some arrangement with the king of the two Sicilies, against the reigning Bashaw, and, as a last resort, to return to Upper Egypt.

On the 6th of August, 1805, Eaton took passage for the United States, and arrived at Hampton Roads in November, having touched at Malta, Tunis, Gibraltar, and Madeira. He was received with lively demonstrations of respect by the citizens of Richmond, who tendered him the honor of a public dinner. The same distinction awaited him in Washington.

His brilliant services to the country in the war with Tripoli had given him an enviable reputation throughout the United States. It was generally agreed, that his exertions had compelled the Bashaw to offer terms of peace; and that, if the treaty had not been so hastily concluded, and the naval force in the Mediterranean had properly sustained him, he would in a short time have made himself master of Tripoli, dictated his own terms of peace, and prevented the necessity of any further tribute to the Barbary powers. In the President's message to Congress, his name was mentioned with distinguished honor; but the measures of Lear were supported by the administration. With his usual warmth and imprudence, Eaton commented severely on that gentleman's conduct, and thus gave much offence in the political circles of Washington. The quickness of his temper, and some peculiarities of manners, no doubt, excited strong prejudices against him in the minds of many, and probably had their influence in repressing the disposition of Congress to acknowledge his services in the manner their importance deserved

IN the December following his return to the United States, Eaton visited his family in Brimfield. In the principal cities and towns on the way, he was complimented with public dinners, and other expressions of popular respect. He remained but a short time at home. His business with the government demanded immediate attention and a speedy return to Washington. His services having been publicly noticed in the President's message, a resolution was introduced into the House of Representatives of the United States, to present him with a medal in commemoration of his brilliant enterprise. The resolution, after a debate of great warmth, was negatived by a small majority.

The Legislature of Massachusetts, however, treated him in a very different manner. They passed a resolve, with a suitable preamble, authorizing the committee for the sale of eastern lands, to convey to him, his heirs, and assigns, a tract of ten thousand acres of any of the unappropriated land of the Commonwealth in the District of Maine, and the Governor was requested to transmit to him an authentic copy.

In the autumn of 1806, Eaton was solicited to become a candidate for a seat in Congress for Hampshire South District. Two gentlemen, representing the respective parties into which the district, as well as the country, was divided, had already appeared in the field. Many citizens, fearing disastrous measures from the violence of party spirit, were desirous of being represented by some person of high character, unpledged to any set of public measures, and fixed their eyes on Eaton. He instantly replied in the following manly terms.

“I have really no ambition, in the existing state of our national affairs and political relations, to take on me the high responsibility of representing this district in Congress. I have already refused to be named as a party candidate, because, believing it possible, that both parties may have permitted themselves to become too much adherents to party, a pledge to either would tend to cramp the freedom of deliberation.

“From this expression of my feelings, you may naturally draw, Sir, a conclusion of my political sentiments. We want more union, more energy, more of the temper of accommodation. The names Federalism and Democracy, which, at this moment, split the affections of our countrymen, ought to be lost in the proud name of American. Till this event happens, I fear we shall continue to be weak at home, disrespected abroad. With these candid declarations before you, and deciding on them, use my name, Sir, if you think it may be used to the service of my country.” The wishes of Eaton’s friends, however, were not gratified. He never became a member of the House of Representatives of the United States.

During the session of 1806–7, Eaton was again at Washington, occupied with the adjustment of his accounts. A bill was passed in the month of February, and approved by President Jefferson, authorizing and directing the proper accounting officers to liquidate and settle them upon just and equitable principles, under the direction of the Secretary of State. He had first, however, addressed the Chairman of the Committee of Claims in the following terms.

“Washington City, February 9th, 1807.

“SIR,

“On a review of the statement accompanying my petition of 20th February, 1804, now before this honorable Committee, I cannot find a paragraph which needs correction or modification. That statement surveys the chief ground and origin of my claims. Have the goodness, Sir, to pass attentively over it; and to carry forward, in the examination, a view of the events which have since occurred to establish the correctness of the measures there alluded to. It will satisfy you that a perseverance in those measures has given peace to this country, and emancipation to three hundred of our fellow citizens; and that, while it has done something to stamp a good impression on the pirates of Barbary, it has saved your treasury more than a million of dollars. My reward, hitherto, is penury and wounds! I ought not, perhaps, to say this; it carries something which savors of reproach; this I do not mean. I have nowhere been refused indemnity. On the contrary, three years ago, when as yet the effects of my arrangements had not been realized, your Committee expressed an opinion that I had a well founded claim on the government.

“But the delay, in the decision necessary to a reimbursement of my expenditures, has greatly distressed me in my individual concerns; expenditures of which my country now reap the profit; and of which a vast majority of my countrymen appear to be very sensible.

“I do not present myself here to ask alms, nor to expect gratuities; nor yet to draw on your sensibility to awaken a consideration for all the sacrifices to which I yielded, in standing to the duties of my station at the court of a piratical despot, and on the coast of a savage enemy. You cannot make me such indemnity; you cannot, Sir, under any shape I can present the claim, award me a remuneration for the sacrifices of property incident to the vexations, impositions, and proscriptions which the Bey of Tunis practised on me in consequence of my resistance to his unwarrantable exactions against the United States. You cannot bring back to me nine years of active life; you cannot restore to me the strength of an arm. But for actual disbursements for the benefit of our common country, whether voluntary or extorted, I have a right again to resort to your justice, and to believe that this justice will be no longer delayed

sition and the righteousness of this Committee to give my claims a deliberate and a seasonable review, and an equitable award.

“With regard, however, to the last item of my charge, it should be remarked, this was not originally intended to be brought against the United States. I had faith, that the honor of the court of Sardinia would redeem the paper of a nobleman charged with the high trust of a national negotiator; and, in case of failure here, had confidence in the exertions of the son of that nobleman to reimburse me the cash I was compelled to pay, as his surety, for the redemption of the child of his affection, and for the honor of his family. I should, undoubtedly, have realized these confidences, had not a dispensation of the government of the United States (unacquainted with the usages of that country) released the surety held at Tunis for the debt, and been construed by the Chevalier Porcille as a generous acquittal of the debtor. A reimbursement ought to come from the court of Sardinia to our government. Papers touching this transaction are submitted with my other documents.

“The heavy expenses incident to an appeal to this Chancery for such a length of time as I have been before you, and at so great a distance from my home, together with the circumstances of these private funds lying so long useless to me, have necessarily laid me under pecuniary responsibility to my friends. The suspense of another year must lodge me in a prison.

“If you find, Sir, that I have been upright to my country, let my country, by a reciprocity, now enable me to ransom myself. I have the honor to be, &c.

In May of this year, Eaton was elected by the citizens of Brimfield to represent them in the Legislature of Massachusetts. He was unable to take his seat at the first session, having been summoned to attend as a witness, before the court in Richmond, on the celebrated trial of Aaron Burr for high treason. Great efforts were made by the prisoner and his counsel to destroy the testimony of Eaton, particularly by the evidence of Colonel Gaither; but, though suspicions remained in the minds of some, that he had listened too favorably to the seductive propositions of Burr, his testimony was not invalidated, and his defence of his proceedings and character must be regarded by every candid mind as perfectly successful. In his deposition, he gave a full and minute account of his intercourse with Colonel Burr, and its termination. After recapitulating the heads of the treasonable scheme that had been explained to him, he proceeds as follows.

“I listened to the exposition of Colonel Burr’s views with seeming acquiescence. Every interview convinced me more and more, that he had organized a deep-laid plot of treason in the West, in the accomplishment of which he felt fully confident. Till, at length, I discovered, that his ambition was not bounded by the waters of the Mississippi, and Mexico, but that he meditated overthrowing the present government of our country. He said, if he could gain over the marine corps, and secure the naval commanders, Truxton, Preble, Decatur, and others, he would turn Congress neck and heels out of doors; assassinate the President; seize on the treasury and navy; and declare himself the protector of an energetic government.

“The honorable trust of corrupting the marine corps, and of sounding Commodore Preble and Captain Decatur, Colonel Burr proposed confiding to me. Shocked at this proposition, I dropped the mask, and exclaimed against his views. He talked of the degraded situation of our country, and the necessity of a blow, by which its energy and its dignity should be restored; said, if that blow could be struck here at this time, he was confident of the support of the best blood of America. I told Colonel

Burr he deceived himself in presuming, that he, or any other man, could excite a party in this country, who would countenance him in such a plot of desperation, murder, and treason. He replied, that he, perhaps, knew better the dispositions of the influential citizens of this country, than I did. I told him one solitary word would destroy him. He asked what word? I answered, Usurper! He smiled at my hesitation, and quoted some great examples in his favor. I observed to him, that I had lately travelled from one extreme of the Union to the other; and, though I found a diversity of political opinion among the people, they appeared united at the most distant aspect of national danger. That, for the section of the Union to which I belonged, I would vouch, should he succeed in the first instance here, he would within six weeks afterwards have his throat cut by Yankee militia.

“Though wild and extravagant Mr. Burr’s last project, and though fraught with premeditated slaughter, I felt very easy on the subject, because its defeat he had deposited in my own hands. I did not feel so secure concerning that of disjoining the Union. But the very interesting and embarrassing situation, in which his communications placed me, left me, I confess, at a stand to know how to conduct myself with propriety. He had committed no overt act of aggression against law. I could draw nothing from him in writing; nor could I learn, that he had exposed his plans to any person near me, by whom my testimony could be supported. He had mentioned to me no persons who were principally and decidedly engaged with him, except General Wilkinson, a Mr. Alston, who I found was his son-in-law, and a Mr. Ephraim Kibby, late a captain of rangers in General Wayne's army. Satisfied that Mr. Burr was resolute in pushing his project of rebellion in the west of the Allegany, and apprehensive that it was too well and too extensively organized to be easily suppressed; though I dreaded the weight of his character when laid in the balance against my solitary assertion, I brought myself to the resolution to endeavor to defeat it, by getting him removed from among us, or to expose myself to all consequences by a disclosure of his intentions. Accordingly, I waited on the President of the United States; and, after some desultory conversation, in which I aimed to draw his view to the westward, I used the freedom to say to the President, I thought Mr. Burr should be sent out of this country, and gave for reason, that I believed him dangerous in it. The President asked where he should be sent? I mentioned London and Cadiz. The President thought the trust too important, and seemed to entertain a doubt of Mr. Burr's integrity. I intimated that no one, perhaps, had stronger grounds to mistrust Mr. Burr's moral integrity than myself; yet I believed ambition so much predominated over him, that, when placed on an eminence and put on his honor, respect to himself would ensure his fidelity; his talents were unquestionable.

"I perceived the subject was disagreeable to the President; and, to give it the shortest course to the point, declared my concern, that, if Mr. Burr were not in some way disposed of, we should, within eighteen months, have an insurrection, if not a revolution, on the waters of the Mississippi. The President answered, that he had too much confidence in the information, the integrity, and the attachment to the Union, of the citizens of that country, to admit an apprehension of the kind. I am happy, that events prove this confidence well placed. As no interrogatories followed my expression of alarm, I thought silence on the subject, at that time and place, became me. But I detailed, about the same time, the whole projects of Mr. Burr to certain members of Congress. They believed Colonel Burr capable of any thing, and agreed, that the fellow ought to be hanged; but thought his projects too chimerical, and his circumstances too desperate, to give the subject the merit of serious consideration. The total security of feeling in those to whom I had rung the tocsin, induced me to suspect my own apprehensions unseasonable, or at least too deeply admitted; and, of course, I grew indifferent about the subject.

“Mr. Burr’s visits to me became less frequent, and his conversation less familiar. He appeared to have abandoned the idea of a general revolution, but seemed bent on that of the Mississippi; and, although I could perceive symptoms of distrust in him towards me, he manifested great solicitude to engage me with him in the enterprise. Weary of his importunity, and at once to convince him of my serious attachments, I gave the following toast to the public.

“‘The United States.—Palsy to the brain that should plot to dismember, and leprosy to the hand, that will not draw to defend our union!’

“I doubt whether the sentiment was better understood by any of my acquaintance than Colonel Burr. Our intercourse ended here; we met but seldom afterward. I returned to my farm in Massachusetts, and thought no more of Mr. Burr, nor his empire, till some time late in September or in the beginning of October, when a letter from Morris Belknap, of Marietta, to Timothy E. Danielson, fell into my hands at Brimfield, which satisfied me that Mr. Burr had actually commenced his preparatory operations on the Ohio. I now spoke publicly of the fact; transmitted a copy of the letter from Belknap to the Department of State, and, about the same time, forwarded, through the hands of the Postmaster-General, to the President of the United States, a statement, in substance, of what is here above detailed concerning the Mississippi conspiracy of the said Colonel Aaron Burr; which is said to have been the first formal intelligence received by the executive on the subject of the conspirator being in motion."

The preceding extract contains all that is essential to Eaton's defence. The whole document is extremely curious, as an illustration of the ambitious enterprise of the most turbulent spirit, that ever interrupted the repose of the United States.

Eaton returned to Brimfield, after having concluded the business that had summoned him from home, and took his seat in the Legislature of Massachusetts in December. The town which he represented was decidedly Federal, and of course expected him to shape his political course according to the doctrines of that party. But Eaton had been absent in foreign service during the most active years of party contention, and, though he agreed in general with the political views of the Federalists, he felt as yet none of that wholesale party zeal, that sacrifices every thing else to party objects. The state of his mind is fairly exhibited in the letter quoted in a preceding page. Accordingly, he refused to surrender his individual sentiments, and expressed himself with a degree of freedom, and perhaps imprudence, that gave great offence to the Federal leaders.

It was charged against him, that he attempted to win the good opinion of both parties, and the charge is seemingly supported by his biographer, but without the slightest foundation. In the whole course of his public career, his conduct was such as to forbid such a supposition upon any candid construction of motives and actions. He carried his freedom of opinion and expression to a faulty excess, which created many enemies, public and private. The fanaticism of party spirit in free countries is as intolerant as fanaticism in religion. Individual opinions are restrained by a tyranny as inexorable, as that of the Holy Vehme, the secret tribunals of the Middle Ages. Let the politician venture to oppose a measure of the party to which he is supposed to belong, or express an opinion varying in the least from the received standard of political orthodoxy, and no epithets of abuse are too vile to be applied to his conduct; no baseness too deep to be imputed to his motives; no punishment within the power of his self-constituted and inexorable judges, too severe to be inflicted, by wounding his sensibility, if not by injuring his person. No matter how pure his private life, how stainless his honor, how brilliant his talents, how venerable his age, how numerous and important his services to the republic; the claims of purity, of honor, of talents, of age, of public service, are drowned by the senseless cries of the multitude; his character is offered up, and his prospects blighted, to appease the wrath of men, who are unworthy to loosen the latchet of his shoes.

In the spring of 1808, Eaton was again summoned to appear as a witness, in the trial of a person charged with being an accomplice of Burr, before the District Court of the United States, then sitting in Philadelphia. On his return, he was mortified to learn, that the disapprobation of his conduct, as a member of the legislature, had prevented his reëlection by his fellow citizens. This disappointment, and the failure of other expectations, particularly of receiving a military command in the army of the United States, deeply affected his mind. His pecuniary affairs became embarrassed, and his manners and conduct in social life were not such as to conciliate the favor of those who surrounded him. The activity and excitement of his busiest years; the singular scenes he had witnessed; the strange manners of the people he had so long dwelt among, had, in fact, unfitted him for the quiet pursuits of civil life. He was unequal to the contest with disappointed hopes and pecuniary embarrassments, and gave himself up to misanthropy and despair, except in moments of intemperate indulgence; a temptation which became at last too strong to be resisted.

In August of this year, his domestic peace was deeply wounded by the death of his beloved step-son, the favorite companion of his adventures at Derne, E. E. Danielson, who fell in a duel with a naval officer, at New York. The feelings expressed in his reply to Lieutenant Babbitt, of the Navy, who had communicated the sad event, are too honorable to his head and heart to be omitted in this place.

“DEAR SIR, “Brimfield, August 14th, 1808.

“The sympathy you manifest in the event which occurred on the 5th instant, so afflicting to myself and family, receives our unaffected acknowledgments.

“I wish Danielson might have lived to the usefulness of which he was capable. But who can parry the arrow of death! The when and the where we receive the shock is of less consequence than the how. I have always flattered myself, that your friend could not die unlike a brave man; but it pains me that the ground of his fall had not been marked with more usefulness to his country. Brave, great, and experienced men may sometimes find it necessary to their reputation, that they meet in personal contest. This may be justified where the fate of a nation is depending; such occurrences are rare; but the trivial disputes, which excite ardent young men to put life up at a game of hazard, cannot be reconciled to principles of morality, patriotism, or character. Danielson wanted no tests of his bravery; young as he was, experience had tested this. I lament more the absence of his prudence, than I should the loss we feel, had he fallen in the legitimate field of glory. The manner of Hamilton's death added nothing to the lustre of his fame; and the circumstance of Burr's killing him gave no man the more confidence in Burr's honesty or patriotism; the catastrophe satisfied no one on the merits of the cause which produced it. Individuals may slaughter each other honorably by the laws of chivalry; all that society can pronounce on this exhibition of courage is,—‘Alas!’ The absence of Commodore Rogers at that eventful moment is much to be lamented. His presence would have overawed the extremity, which has brought affliction to the concerned for the deceased, and a loss to the service of our country. I most devoutly hope that this unhappy incident may prove a caution to the young gentlemen of your profession against sudden sallies of passion.

“Any thing in detail, which you can state concerning the melancholy death of my son and friend, will confer on me a peculiar obligation. I have received no communications from Mr. Boyd or Mr. Evans on the subject.

“I am, Sir, &c.,

The remaining events of Eaton's life are too simple and unimportant to require an extended narration. His occupations were those of a private citizen in a country town. He maintained a correspondence with the friends, whom he had known in his public life, particularly with the Ex-Bashaw. A cordial attachment existed on both sides, which was kept up by frequent interchanges of letters. Eaton took an active part in urging his claims upon the attention of Congress, and not without success; and had, at last, the satisfaction of learning, that the Bashaw had been appointed to the government of Derne, through the agency of the United States. His intercourse with Mr. Cathcart was renewed; that gentleman having returned home, after an unsuccessful attempt to assume the office of consul at Tunis, to which he had been appointed. He continued to take an interest in public affairs, and delivered a powerful speech, in August, 1808, at a town meeting in Brimfield, convened for the purpose of considering the expediency of petitioning the President of the United States to remove the embargo, or to summon Congress, if his authority to do this himself was deemed insufficient. The speech was thoroughly Federal in its political tone, and expressed the views of his fellow townsmen with such clearness and vigor, that a copy was requested for the press. It was printed in the newspapers of the day, and widely circulated.

At length, the fatigues he had borne, the disappointments he had met with, the excesses he had indulged in, undermined his constitution and prostrated his health. During the winter of 1809-10, he suffered severely from rheumatism and gout. The succeeding spring and summer he partially recovered, but the approach of winter brought back his old complaints with increased severity. His strength daily failed; but he lingered in a state of great bodily suffering until the 1st of June. In the intervals of distress, his love of social intercourse and facetious or satirical conversation was too powerful to be restrained ; and, as long as he had the command of his senses, he listened eagerly to foreign and political news. He expired on the evening of June 1st, 1811. Previous to his death, he had requested to be buried with military honors, and designated the gentlemen whom he wished to act as pall-bearers. His wishes were complied with in every particular ; and his body was carried to the church, where a funeral discourse was delivered by his long-tried friend, the Reverend Dr. Welch, of Mansfield, Connecticut. He was in his forty-eighth year at the time of his death.

In person, Eaton was about five feet eight inches in height. His complexion was fair and ruddy ; his eyes large and blue ; and his whole countenance expressive of energy, dignity, and command. His military talents were of a high order. His intellect was strong, his perceptions acute, his feelings ardent. He was quick to resent injuries, but of the most generous disposition, when the first impulse of passion was over. His devotion to the interests and honor of his country, even under circumstances calculated to exhaust his patience and irritate his temper, exhibited his character in a most favorable light. In his diplomatic intercourse with the Barbary pirates, he adopted a tone of boldness and independence which astonished them, accustomed as they had always been to the most abject and humiliating submission. In some particulars, perhaps, his eccentric conduct and irritable temper threw difficulties in his way, that might have been avoided by a more complying disposition. The opinions he expressed in his correspondence with the Department of State, and with private friends, were singularly acute and correct; and, had they been acted upon at an earlier period, would have saved the United States many degrading concessions, and secured to the American arms imperishable glory.

As a writer, Eaton possessed extraordinary command of language, and energy of expression. His imagination was vigorous and discursive, but his taste was not sufficiently chastened by the study of classical models. Had he devoted himself to letters, he might have adorned almost any department except poetry. As a public speaker, his efforts were characterized by fluency and even eloquence, and a far-reaching political foresight. As a soldier, he was fearless of danger, persevering in the pursuit of his object, patient under fatigue, and full of resources to meet every military emergency. His qualifications for a life of danger and adventure were extraordinary. He loved hazardous enterprises to enthusiasm, because they called into action those energies of his daring character in which he most delighted. But all his labors and hopes centred in the love of country and the love of glory. His country failed to requite his devotion, and the shortness of his life left his aspirations for glory but imperfectly gratified.
